The Department of Environmental Quality is carrying out emissions testing from a white van parked outside Gateway Mall.

Pollution

sends the rays back. The rays then analyze the exhaust plume left behind by the car for the amount of hydrocarbons, carbon dioxide and nitrogen oxide. This indicates whether emission levels are below the standard used in Portland.

If it is, the car passes with low emission, and the driver is rewarded with a green light and a message: "saving you money." If it gets a high or medium grade, then the driver is reminded that his or her car is "costing you money."

Additionally, a camera also takes a picture of the car's license plate and another piece of equipment records the car's speed. All of this information is sent to the van to be crunched and compared to other cities.

This information is helpful to have, DEQ's Larcen said, because it gives a good broad-based feel for how Oregon is doing overall as far as emissions standards go.

"If we get nothing but 'passes' in Portland, it's not really data," Larcen said.

Right now the only numbers crunched have been those in Bend. With just more than 9,000 cars tested, there was about a 25 percent failure rate as opposed to a 12 percent failure rate in Portland, Hunt said. Here in Eugene, he said they are probably looking at about a 15-20 percent failure rate.

The Lane Regional Air Pollution Authority handles air quality in Lane County, and DEQ handles it everywhere else in the state. When LRAPA heard about what the DEQ was doing with the Remote Emissions testing, it immediately wanted to become involved.

The data obtained will be used strictly for comparisons. Neither the DEQ nor LRAPA plan to institute a testing system in Lane County; LRAPA simply wants the information to see how the area is doing in comparison to other areas around the state.

"It's just a good snapshot to let us know what the vehicle fleet of Lane County is," said Kim Metzler, public affairs manager with LRAPA.

Another part of the testing trip, Larcen said, is simple public relations and letting people know what's going on.

"We've had a wonderful reception down here," said Pat Petty, DEQ vehicle inspector. "So many people really are in favor of clean air."

The trip is planned to last for three months. Beginning in Redmond, the van has spent time in Bend, Salem and Woodburn. It will be in Eugene until Saturday, and then the journey will end.

The journey is slated for only three months because the DEQ must soon return it to the University of Georgia, where it was created. This testing system has been around for about 10 years.

After spending today and Friday on Coburg Road off Beltline East, the van will be moved to another location off Exit 194B at I-5 on Saturday.
