here after they finish their two years there. So we need to make sure that students coming into [the University] have the best possible education.

There will be a rise in tuition next year, but we have had a tuition freeze for the last 5 years. So not this year, but next year, there will be an inflationary tuition raise. In the last five years, tuition hasn't gone up at all, so it's just going to be bumped up for inflation. But we'll keep an eye on that.

We know that if the Republicans take power, we're going to be battling to keep our student fees, which we thought we won with Southworth. Last year, with Southworth, which was a Supreme Court case where they challenged student fees all the way up to the Supreme Court, we won 9-0 ... which would make you think that the fight's over, right? But the Republicans have it in their platform that they're going to look at student fees. It's basically looking at if student fees can fund political organizations, such as say, OSPiRG, or the College Democrats, College Republicans, or if students get to choose where their student fees go, if that's legal. We think it is, and we're going to fight for it.

“ I hope I've established a good relationship with the administration and I hope to keep it that way. But I've kind of shown in my past that I'm not afraid of standing up to anybody, and saying what I feel. I'm also not out to piss people off.”

Jay Breslow
ASUO President

Q: What relationship do you expect to have with the administration?

A: We get along great at this point. We need their help, and they need our help for voter registration. We have some issues on the ballot next year that I can't talk about openly because of my position, that could drastically affect higher education, not only students, but administration. We need to have a united front for ballot measures that could drastically affect higher education.

I hope I've established a good relationship with the administration, and I hope to keep it that way. But I've kind of shown in my past that I'm not afraid of standing up to anybody, and saying what I feel. I'm also not out to piss people off, or to make people angry or to set up an adversarial relationship.

Q: What does the future hold for your office and the Worker Rights Consortium?

A: The ASUO will fight for the WRC. The reasoning behind that is because last year's students voted for it, and by a 75 percent majority they passed the WRC. So as far as this administration is concerned, we're in support of the consortium, and we'll do all things in our power to do what was deemed a good thing by an overwhelming majority.

Our executive will fight to educate the campus on the decision that was made last year. Maybe we can go back and explain how it happened, and people will see that we signed on to the best monitoring organization that was available, and we'll talk about corporatization issues, you know, what happens when corporations have too-high an influence on the University.

Some of the stuff we need to start looking at — corporatization and Turn to Breslow, page 17A
