The Oregon defense hopes to stop Marques Tuiasosopo's option plays with the same prowess as it did to DeShaun Foster's running game.

will be a priority for Washington. If that fails, Tuiasosopo — who has thrown just three touchdown passes and five interceptions this season — will have to face the country's ninth-best passing defense.

"Oregon is definitely an aggressive defense," Washington head coach Rick Neuheisel said. "They are a defense that is definitely going to take advantage of the fact that it is difficult to communicate in their stadium. It will take a real great effort on our part to find some ways to execute the throwing game. I think ultimately it will come down to being able to run the ball."

When asked if his defense would be able to stop Tuiasosopo and Washington's option, Aliotti said, "I'll let you know after the game."

Johnson, on the other hand, is a little more confident in the defense's ability to contain its opponent once again.

"I think we have the talent to stop them," Johnson said. "If we play our rules and play fast, we'll win the game."
