Voter list

niz campaign, and he could have called people as Katz and Greenough did. But, Unger said, just as the ASUO trusts the DeMuniz campaigners, it trusts Austin not to use the list, either.

"I have no facts or reasons to disbelieve these people," Unger said.

But because DeMuniz supporters already had the opportunity to use the complete list, Austin said, it should be open to everybody.

"It's a matter of access," he said.

Unger and ASUO State Affairs Coordinator Brian Tanner both said they will not release the complete list until after the election. The ASUO voter study will be contaminated, they said, if political parties begin calling the same voters that the ASUO is calling.

"Our biggest concern is the study and making sure it is non-partisan," Tanner said. "That's why we don't want to give out the list."

Tauber said he will keep the database on a backup disk in case the computer crashes, but will not make a printout.

"That list has never been disseminated, except briefly to Mr. Katz," Tauber said. "It's not my list to use. I shan't."

Unger said it makes perfect sense for Tauber to have a backup because he is the project's technical support. She confirmed that Tauber has not printed a list.

Katz said he is frustrated that the integrity of those organizing the ASUO voter participation campaign is being questioned, saying that they've "put in hours and hours of time for a very worthy cause."

He also said Austin is simply using the controversy to gain leverage in the ASUO, and called him "a McCarthyite."

"I'm disturbed by his tactics of intimidation and innuendo," he said.

Tanner said anyone can legally obtain a registered voter database from Lane County Elections for a fee. He added that anyone can filter that list down to just students.

But Austin said he wants the ASUO's list because it is already narrowed down to those he is interested in calling.

Unger and Tanner stand firm with their refusal to release the database.

"We have done nothing wrong and ... they're trying to scare us," Unger said.

Austin thinks Unger and Tanner's expectation that those who have the list will not use it is unrealistic. He wants everyone to have the list or nobody at all.

"It's not good enough to ask them not to use it," he said. "It's like giving a kid a box of candy and saying don't eat it."

Candidates

from sanctioning or promoting homosexual and bisexual behavior.

"I am completely opposed to this measure," Barnhart said. "As a member of the Eugene School Board, I can see how this measure would be enormously destructive."

Barnhart said the Oregonian and The Register-Guard reported that Young supports the measure. Young, however, said he was misquoted in both papers, and retractions were printed the next day.

"Before I was educated on the implications of the measure, I took the standpoint that sexuality should be taught by parents," Young said. "After I received the exact literature of the measure, I was very opposed."

Sorg said he is also vehemently opposed to Measure 9.

"You can't choose your sexuality," Sorg said.

All three also agreed that student governments, such as the ASUO, should be in control of incidental fees. Currently, student government allocates approximately $5.5 million in student fees to pay for football tickets and more than 100 student groups, such as the Multicultural Center and the Survival Center.

Student concern about campaign funding was also discussed. Both Barnhart and Sorg said they were in favor of Measure 6, which would provide public funding to candidates who limit spending and the amount of private contributions they collect.

"Measure 6 is the beginning to a solution for campaign spending," Barnhart said.

Young said he feels spending is too high, but that funding should not be limited, though he didn't specifically address Measure 6.

Sorg disagreed, saying all money donated to political parties to support candidates, called "soft money," should be refused, and direct contributions to candidates should be limited.

Another issue discussed was the Oregon Need Grant, which currently provides grants to 17,500 low-income students. This year, the program did not provide for 12 percent of the students who qualified for it.

The candidates said they would ensure all deserving students receive aid, but each has a different idea of how to accomplish that.

"With the increase of the work study program, students who weren't given the grant would be able to work for the money instead," Young said.

Sorg referred back to his stance on changing the current tax structure.

"We could find the funds by taxing the rich more," Sorg said.

Barnhart said if the tax-cutting measures pass, less funding for such grants will be available.
