maybe even sneak onto a few national telecasts — the country's best players will continue to wonder, "Where in the hell is Oregon?"

Some say that Oregon misses out on the elite because of the Willamette Valley's weather. But longtime national exposure motivates Parade All-Americans and blue-chip athletes to sign with teams, no matter where they're located.

It may be nice and warm in Florida, but if Oregon and Oregon State stay in the top-10 for years to come, making the Civil War a recurring network event, players will gladly give up the sun for a rain-soaked existence.

Maybe by the time that actually happens, the country will have figured out if Gore or Texas Gov. George W. Bush is president. This week, though, the nation's eyes will turn southward for an entirely different reason than a fumbled election. One fan named "Swamp-Gator" posted on an Internet message board, summing up his team's chances and the atmosphere in Florida.

"Yea, they have a very good team, but this is the state of Florida; and although we may not be able to count, we can play football!"

In Florida, football teams usually don't stop counting until they reach No. 1.
