said. Lichtenstein described Morse as the most famous labor arbitrator of the 1930's.

"He was a man with a social conscience," Lichtenstein said, "and he was pro-union."

Between 1958 and 1973, Morse donated 1200 linear feet of personal and senatorial papers to the University's Special Collections. The Morse collection is the largest at the Knight Library.

The exhibit, sponsored by the Wayne Morse Center for Law and Politics, is part of a continuing program focusing on "Labor in a Global Economy."

Margaret Hallock, director of the Wayne Morse Chair, described Lichtenstein as "the most eminent labor historian writing today."

"This was an illuminating lesson about the challenges facing American workers," Hallock said. "It's often forgotten that workers are human beings. We have to check our rights at the door."

Lichtenstein's address sparked a great deal of discussion among those at the reception afterwards. Tom Leedham, secretary treasurer of the Local 206 Teamsters, appreciated Lichtenstein's perspective.

"Workers can't rely on the judicial system to work for them," Leedham said. "You need more democracy to build power for the working people."

A vehicle crashed into the 7-Eleven convenience store at the corner of Franklin Blvd. and Patterson St. about 9 p.m. Sunday, EPD Officer J. Warden said.

The car was pulling into the parking lot when, instead of stopping, it slammed over a curb and through the storefront window, knocking down rows of merchandise.

Alcohol was not involved, according to Warden. No one was injured in the incident.

"The driver just stepped on the gas instead of the brake," Warden said.
