Multicultural

multicultural unions — from considering a group's viewpoints when it decides whether to grant funds.

"It's kind of contradictory," Banfield said. "It's going to be allocated within the viewpoint of the Multicultural Center."

When the court released its decision during spring break, Justice Ashan Awan said the money can be allocated neutrally, and the MCC needs to rewrite its bylaws to reflect these changes.

Viewpoint neutrality became a concern last spring when the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that incidental fees must be allocated in a neutral manner, but students can't opt out of paying for groups with which they politically disagree.

But Banfield said the MCC fund should be the exception to the rule because the money is coming from a student vote rather than an established system such as the ASUO Student Senate or Programs Finance Committee.

"It comes down to the voice of the students," he said.

In the Southworth v. Wisconsin case, the Supreme Court didn't decide how ballot measures fit into the fee system, and the question still remains whether the Southworth case applies to the MCC's allocation of funds.

A complete ASUO budget, including figures for the MCC and OSPIRG ballot measures, should have been sent to University President Dave Frohnmayer by Monday, but ASUO President Jay Breslow said Frohnmayer has extended the deadline to May 1.
