not lost his faith in humanity. Often, he said, people ask him why he doesn't hate the German people. When they ask, Wiener said he tells them a story about a sandwich.

It happened while he was in a concentration camp, working to dismantle a textile factory. The goal was to turn it into an ammunition factory, but in order to maximize efficiency, the Germans kept the women working in the factory while it was being destroyed.

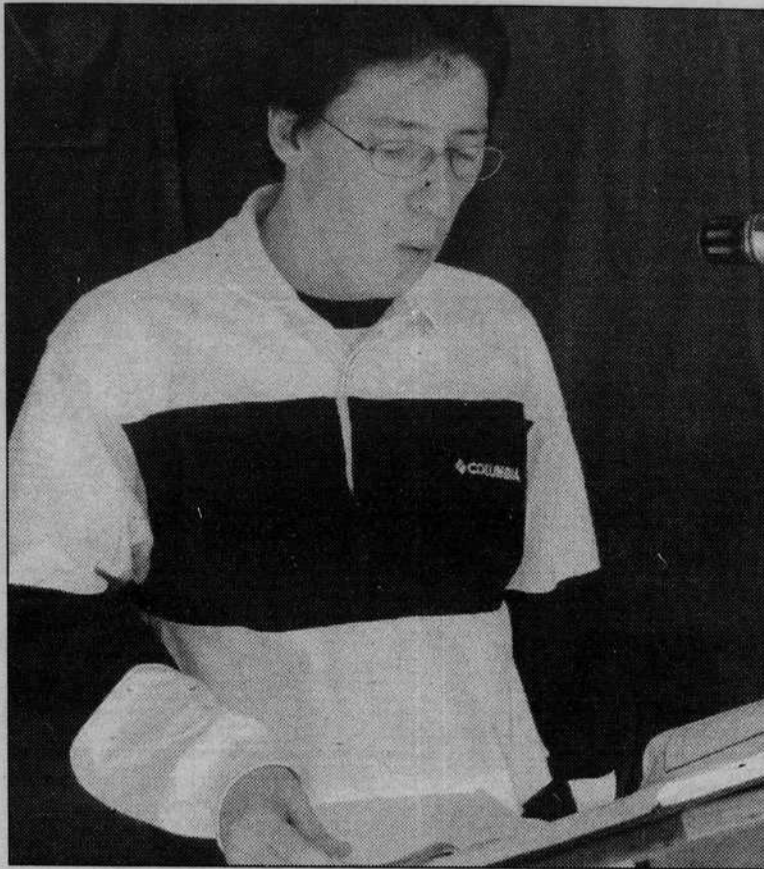

All over the factory, signs were posted warning the German women workers to stay away from the prisoners, Wiener said. They weren't even allowed to look at them.

But one day, Wiener said, one of the German women caught his eye and discreetly offered him a sandwich. He said it is hard to convey to people who haven't lived through the Holocaust what that sandwich meant to him at the time.

That simple gesture, a life-risking move on the part of the woman, showed him that even among the Germans, there were still people who cared.

Wiener said through it all, he has never learned to hate. Instead, he said, he has held on to the values his family instilled in him as a child.

"I was brought up to love," Wiener said. "I have no hatred in me."

Boris Schwartz, a member of the Jewish Student Union, reads the names of Jews who were killed in the Holocaust.

Junior Shayna Kent, who has heard several Holocaust survivors speak, said she encourages students to attend the event. To hear a survivor's story firsthand is much different than watching media coverage about the Holocaust, she said.

"When you hear a Holocaust survivor speak, it's real, it's true," Kent said. "They lived it, they breathed it."
