need to jump higher than her current personal best of 13-5 1/4 to beat Clackamas College's Becky Holliday, who has already vaulted 13-7 this season.

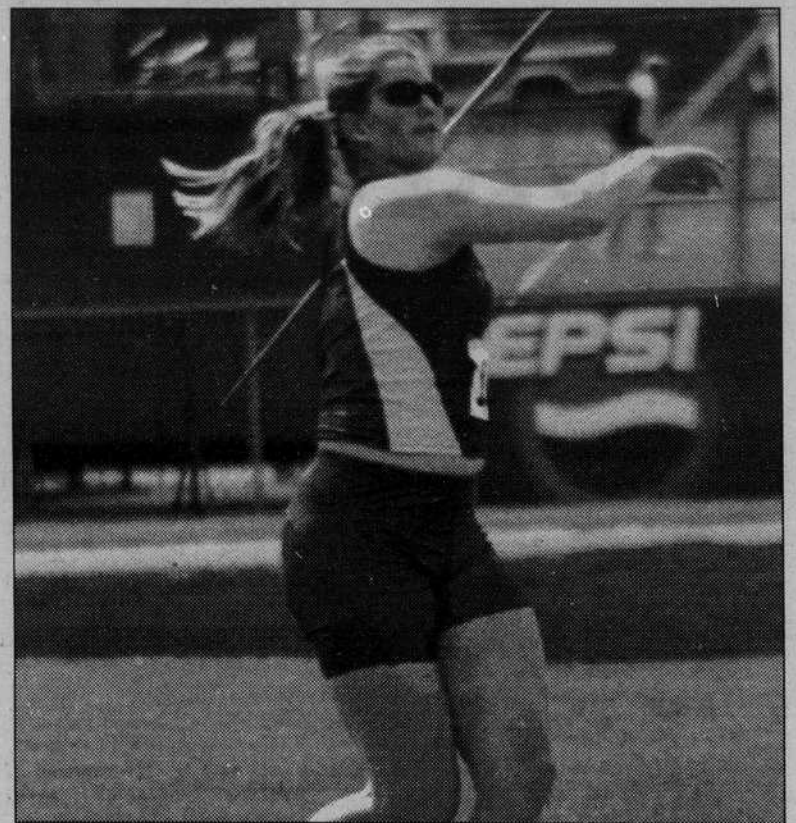

But the Ducks are deep behind Reed, too. Senior Holly Speight will try to move up the NCAA provisional list, while sophomore Georgette Moyle and freshman Kirsten Riley will try to reach Pac-10 heights, which have barely eluded them this season. Senior

“There will be 700 to 800 athletes at this meet. It's good local and regional competition. That's an equation that usually leads to success.”

Karina Elstrom, a former all-American before injuring her back last season, is also working her way up to Pac-10 heights.

While the sprint and middle distance runners may not get as much attention as the field squads, several athletes are improving in those areas as well. Sophomore Eri Macdonald, who already qualified for the Pac-10s in the 1,500, came within .21 of a second from qualifying for the 800 in California last weekend. Davis has also turned in strong performances this year, and could qualify in the 200 or 400 this weekend.

Javelin thrower Sara Dinsmore and the Ducks will aim for high marks this weekend.

In the hurdles, the strongest area of the Ducks' "short game," Cameo Davis has notched a Pac-10 time in the 400 hurdles, while Ann Sullivan did the same in the 100 hurdles. Both could run onto the NCAA provisional list Saturday.

Other Ducks to watch include Amanda Brown, who is looking to land on the NCAA provisional list after qualifying for the Pac-10s in the long jump. Senior Maureen Morrison has been steadily improving in the hammer, and is now only a foot from making the NCAA provisional list.

All athletes will have the advantage of competing on their own track this weekend.

"We competed away from home last weekend, and it was dead quiet on the track," Janette Davis said. "You're running and wondering, 'Where's my crowd, where is everybody?'"

"The fans are incredible here," freshman high jumper Rachael Kriz said.

The Ducks will take on nearly 30 regional schools this weekend, including Pac-10 teams Washington and Arizona State.
