

Emerald promotes staffer to summer editor position

Senior Andrew Adams was selected to take the helm of the paper this summer

For Andrew Adams, one of the best parts of being a journalist is finding stories in unexpected places.

"It's not always the biggest, breaking story that's the most important," he said. "Every person is interesting, and every person has a story."

Adams, who is currently the higher education editor at the Oregon Daily Emerald, will soon have a new outlet for his journalistic enthusiasm. The Emerald board of directors announced Tuesday night that he will be the 2001 summer editor.

A senior journalism major at the University, Adams has long been interested in the newspaper business. He has worked at the Sonoma Index-Tribune in Sonoma, California, and at the East Oregonian in Pendleton as a reporting intern.

He has also been active in journalism at the University. Last year, he worked at the Oregon Commentator, a campus publication, first as a reporter and then as the managing editor. And in the spring of 2000, he joined the Emerald staff as a reporter.

Board Chairman Larry Tergesen said that Adams' experience was a factor in the board's decision.

"We liked his ideas and his experience," he said. "He seemed like a real solid selection."

Board members were also impressed with Adam's ideas for the direction the paper should take in the summer.

"He's really going to try to involve students and the community as a whole, and I think that's a really good approach," production representative Melissa O'Connell said.

Because there is less activity on campus during the summer, Adams said he will try to incorporate more community stories into the paper. But while he will experiment with new ideas, he said he doesn't want to change the focus of the paper.

"A big part of the summer will be maintaining the quality we have here," he said.

The summer editor position begins June 12 and runs through Sept. 14. The 2001-02 editor, Jessica Blanchard, will return in the fall. She was unable to take the summer editor position because of an internship.

Is that a bulge in your crust?

PORTLAND — A significant bulge in the earth's crust has developed over the past four years near volcanoes in central Oregon, but it's not clear whether it could mean a volcanic eruption any time soon, geologists said Tuesday.

The bulge — nine to 12 miles across and about 4 inches high — was detected by satellite radar, said Willie Scott, a USGS scientist at the agency's volcano lab in Vancouver, Wash.

"Because it's a volcanic area, and there's been a long history of volcanic activity in that part of the Cascades, it's possible it might be magma — or molten rock — moving deep underground," Scott said.

The bulge is located near the Three Sisters, a trio of volcanoes at the center of the Cascade Range in Oregon.

The uplift in Central Oregon is too broad and low to be noticed from the ground.

The USGS scientists discovered the bulge through use of a relatively new technique called satellite radar interferometry, which uses satellite data to create images of the Earth's surface.

Images taken at different times can be used to detect changes of even a few inches in the elevation of the ground.

Scientists have looked across the West for signs of bulges, but this is the first prominent change on record using this technique.

"There's nothing as striking as this one," Scott said. "This is quite a prominent uplift."

"But there's nothing right now that makes us think there's an imminent danger" of an eruption, he said.

Professor Alley, a professor in the Robert D. Clark Honors College, is a recipient of the University of Oregon Faculty Achievement Award for Distinguished Teaching. Dr. Alley is a noted scholar of George Elliot and an author of several novels and short stories. In the years since the award and promotion to full professor, Dr. Alley has continued to earn strong reviews from his students.

There are distinct patterns in their narrative comments, including praise for his rigor, insight, and dedication. His students commend his tutorials, in which he meets with each student in his 100-level sequence to help provide individual instruction in composition.

This course is open to all University students, you do not need to be an Honors College student to enroll.

American Fiction Since 1960

- Fulfills Honors College Arts and Letters requirement
- Fulfills Modern British and American Literature requirement for English majors

You do not have to be in the Honors College to take this class. It is open to all students with sophomore standing or above.

We will be studying representative authors from each of the four decades, 1960s, '70s, '80s, and '90s: Ken Kesey (1960s), Alice Walker (1970s, 1980s), Raymond Carver (1980s), Toni Morrison (1990.)

The course will define recent literary trends in our country, some of them as they are happening now. There will be discussion, some lecture, along with assigned paper.

We will also see a few video segments and listen to some tapes. We will spend some time talking about the evolution of popular as well as literary culture.
