According to the Police Commission, those demonstrations have not been 'passive' in nature, but rather 'static.'

Ward 3 Councilor Bonny Bettman, who is also the Police Commission vice chair, said Thursday that she supported banning using pepper spray on political protesters.

"I have a problem using OC spray for political protesters or labor demonstrators," she said. "I don't think it's appropriate to use pepper spray in those situations."

However, committee members maintain that those instances are not frequent in comparison to most uses.

"We have to think outside the political realm," Swensen said, and went on to provide examples of the most common instances of peppering: a bar patron not wanting to leave, a domestic dispute, or a DUI driver who refuses to let go of the steering wheel.

The recommendations were passed conceptually, but the specific language will still undergo minor changes before being presented to the City Council in preparation for a May 29 work session.

The five-page general order the Use of Force Committee presented to the commission last week sets much of the standard for the use of pepper spray by police officers, while still leaving discretion in officers' hands.

The committee also recommended it not be used as a crowd dispersal tool and that officers consider any known pre-existing medical conditions, which has caused adverse reactions for some.

Use of Force Committee chairman Floyd Prozanski said the committee recommendations formalize much of what is already unwritten policy in the EPD.

The commission also voted not to amend the recommendations to include proposed wording changes presented to the commission in a letter from the American Civil Liberties Union. Only two committee members supported amending the recommendation.

Commission member Maurice Denner voiced concerns about the higher standards that would be set, and said the tighter the policy is written, the greater the chance the city could face a lawsuit later.

But for now, the committee plans to finalize the recommendations and send them to the City Council. However, Prozanski said "this is an area we as a commission can always revisit."
