City approves transit project

The Eugene City Council has a lengthy debate over the wording of its final resolution

The Eugene City Council wrangled over wording Monday night, but passed a resolution approving the first phase of the Bus Rapid Transit project by a vote of 6-2.

Councilors debated whether to amend the resolution in a work session they had to extend by 45 minutes before they took a vote. They introduced seven separate amendments to change the resolution's wording, two of which passed. Fifty people filled the chairs and stood against the walls to hear the council's discussion in the McNutt Room at the Eugene City Hall.

Councilors Bonny Bettman and Betty Taylor voted against the transit project. Councilor Bettman introduced three amendments to change language in the final resolution.

"Part of the reason I am looking at amendments is we're being asked to commit a large amount of resources to a plan that is not complete," Bettman said.

The first phase of the project is planned to be built from the University at Franklin Boulevard to downtown Eugene. Lane Transit District officials need approval from participating governments by June to qualify for $4.5 million in federal funding. Springfield City Council and Lane County Commissioners also need to approve the proposal.

Lane Transit District planners explained that the final details for successive phases will be developed over time because the project will be put in place over 20 years.

"LTD and the city have worked together for an entryway to Franklin Boulevard through a three-year public process," said Pat Hocken, LTD planner. "If we don't start, we won't ever get there."

Planning documents listed some elements of the pilot project, including removing some of the vehicle lanes from Franklin Boulevard for use as guideways. Transit development requires some trees along the boulevard be removed to accommodate the new system.

Councilor Nancy Nathanson urged planners to remember one initial reason for the project was to increase ridership on mass transit and alleviate traffic congestion.

"We hope you didn't get rid of the WOW function," she said. "Something new, slick and modern to attract riders to it."

Springfield City Council also met last night on the project. Lane County Commissioners will meet today to vote on the plan.
