around family after that.

"Family became much more important."

A serious injury to his knee, and the ensuing surgery to remove 95 percent of the cartilage, kept him out another month and a half. The prognosis was bad.

"The doctors told me that I might throw three more weeks, three more months, or three more years. They didn't know," said Duncan, explaining why he decided to throw even after being hurt. "So now I treat every throw, every competition, like it might be my last."

"So now I treat every throw, every competition, like it might be my last."

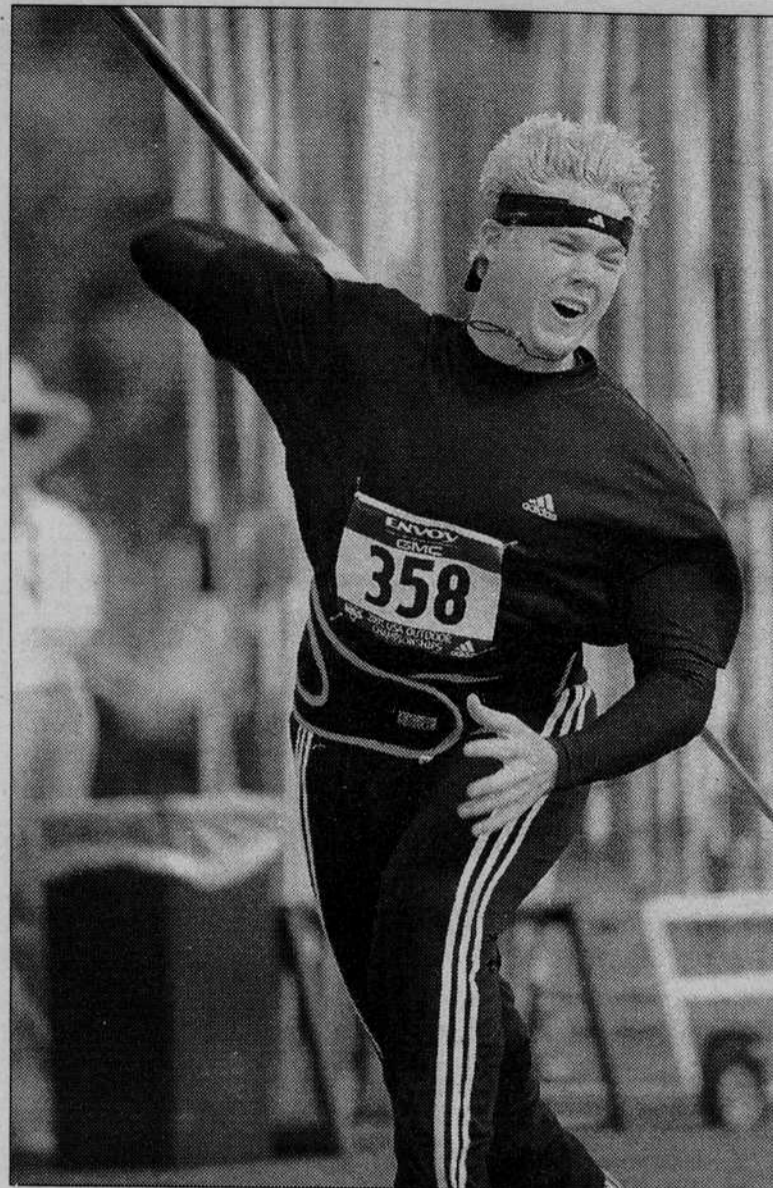

Oscar Duncan
javelin thrower

Saturday Duncan looked more like an old man on the javelin runway than an up-and-coming star. He scratched on his first throw, falling forward and over the line as he held his loose shoulder, then had to pass on his second throw to get through a period of sharp pain. He gave everything he had to his last attempt, but could manage only a sub-par 208-7.

Through it all, Duncan's optimism remained undaunted.

"Next year will hopefully be huge," he said, flashing his characteristic wide grin.

Anything would be better than the year, and the meet, he just had.

Javelin thrower Breaux Greer won the national title with a meet-record toss Saturday.
