DDR

ing DDR, but most people are welcoming and civil.

DDR has caught the interest of more than just gamers. Hollywood wants in on the action. Hollywood, Make Me A Star! Productions is casting for a movie titled "DDR Freak!" Casting Director Dana Savage said while the movie will be a coming of age story, the game will play an integral part.

Writer and Producer Wes Smith researched DDR for more than a year after seeing people lined up to play in Hong Kong. He has interviewed more than 700 people who play DDR asking questions such as how they were introduced to the game and what it means to them. Smith even shared this research with Konami to help them create new versions of DDR.

Smith and Savage said they have received negative criticism about a DDR movie from some players, but they have also had positive responses. Smith said most of the critics complain about the story, but he explained that the synopsis available online is a bare bones summary for industry purposes and is not indicative of the final product. Smith said he wants to capture the good nature of DDR that he sees when he watches people at his local arcade.

"You're going to see all ages and all skill levels, but nobody really makes fun of the players," he said.

Tirona and Lambert both said some DDR players will make fun of people when they are first getting their footing, but for the most part gamers are accepting.
