News briefs

Source of suspect package remains a mystery

The FBI is still investigating the origin of a suspicious package sent to Bernd Crasemann, professor emeritus of physics, in November, but according to FBI spokesperson Beth Anne Steele, there have been no new developments in the case since the letter tested negative for anthrax and other toxic agents.

Crasemann and his assistant opened the package, which he said was postmarked from Malaysia, in his Willamette Hall office at about 9 a.m. Nov. 15. The package contained a powdery substance and a letter with writing in both English and a language Crasemann didn't recognize.

Crasemann reported the letter to the Department of Public Safety, who called in the Eugene Police Department. EPD closed the building's ventilation system and called the FBI and a hazardous materials response team to decontaminate the office.

The Oregon State Public Health Laboratory in Portland conducted tests on the substance and within a few days announced that it was free of anthrax.

Snowboarding

Rogers said. He said judges look for amplitude (how high a rider goes), landing quality, rotation, board grabs and the overall impression of a particular run.

Though the team will compete together, this contest allows only a single winner, Rogers said. The prizes for winning the invitational include CDs, lift tickets and other snowboard-related items, Rogers said.

"Anybody on campus (with) any skill level can compete (in either competition)," Fabricant said. "We want to encourage as many people to participate as possible."

The registration fee is $10 to enter either contest, and $20 for a discounted lift ticket. Spectators pay $32 for a lift ticket, Rogers said.

On Feb. 23, the team's first year of competition will continue with the third annual Windells Timberline Pro Am Classic Series at Mt. Hood's Timberline Lodge.

The next day, the team will trek to Mt. Hood Meadows for the "Jamaican Days" competition.

Many of the members on the team are familiar with the sport but have never competed before, Fabricant said.

"There's a big range in ability level," Fabricant said. "We really want to encourage all those (nonexperienced) people, because in three years they could become one of our top competitors. The club is an incubation opportunity for the team."

Price said there's a hierarchy of competitions for those seeking to be national champions.

"It's just like any other collegiate athletic," Price said. "You start at regionals, which are usually held in Washington, and you move up from there."

Price and Fabricant both agreed the snowboard team isn't ready to tackle national competition.

"It's a goal," Fabricant said. "That's what we're building toward. Maybe next year."
