

Autzen

20,000 square-foot all-purpose lounge, which will be located underneath the three-story tower. The Club will include concessions and bathrooms solely for the people in the luxury areas.

"Autzen Stadium, as an existing stadium, is such a unique stadium that it demands a unique design solution for its expansion," Poston said. "We very much made our expansion design conform to the original spirit and intent of Autzen Stadium."

The 6,000 student seats will remain on the north side, which is the side the Oregon team stands on during the game. The NCAA has a rule that the student section be on the side of the home team, so student Duck fans will remain in the same location.

"I'm not sure that the student body would be interested in moving anyway," Assistant Athletic Director Steve McBride said. "The ones in the largest of those sections are pretty prime seats, and we want to maintain that just as much as the students want to keep that yardage."

The construction of the renovation is in the hands of a joint venture between the Hunt company of Phoenix and Wildish from Eugene. Hunt-Wildish has hired many subcontractors to complete specialized work including three local companies — John Hyland Construction, who will build much of the poured-in-place concrete; Twin Rivers, a plumbing company; and L.H. Morris, an electric company.

Also working for Hunt-Wildish is the Gale Roberts company, which is the same company that built Autzen in 1966. It has now been subcontracted to build some of the site buildings, or unattached structures next to the stadium, including ticketing and maintenance buildings.

Currently, 65 to 75 workers are on site at Autzen, but project manager John Norton expects the number to reach up to 500 people in order for the field to be ready by the Ducks' first game on Aug. 31.

The renovation will be accomplished in what Norton called a "phased completion," with the concourse level and seating bowl ready for the first game against Mississippi State. Construction of the press boxes and skyboxes will continue through the season, which features an Oregon record eight home games, and probably finish some time in the spring of 2003.

In two weeks, two more cranes will be brought to the site in addition to the crane already there. The new cranes will assist in piecing together the new seating bowl on the south side.

Project manager John Norton said approximately 500 workers will be needed on site this summer in order to complete the construction work so the field can be ready for play by the start of Oregon's football season on Aug. 31.
