5 REASONS TO STUDY IN AALBORG, DENMARK

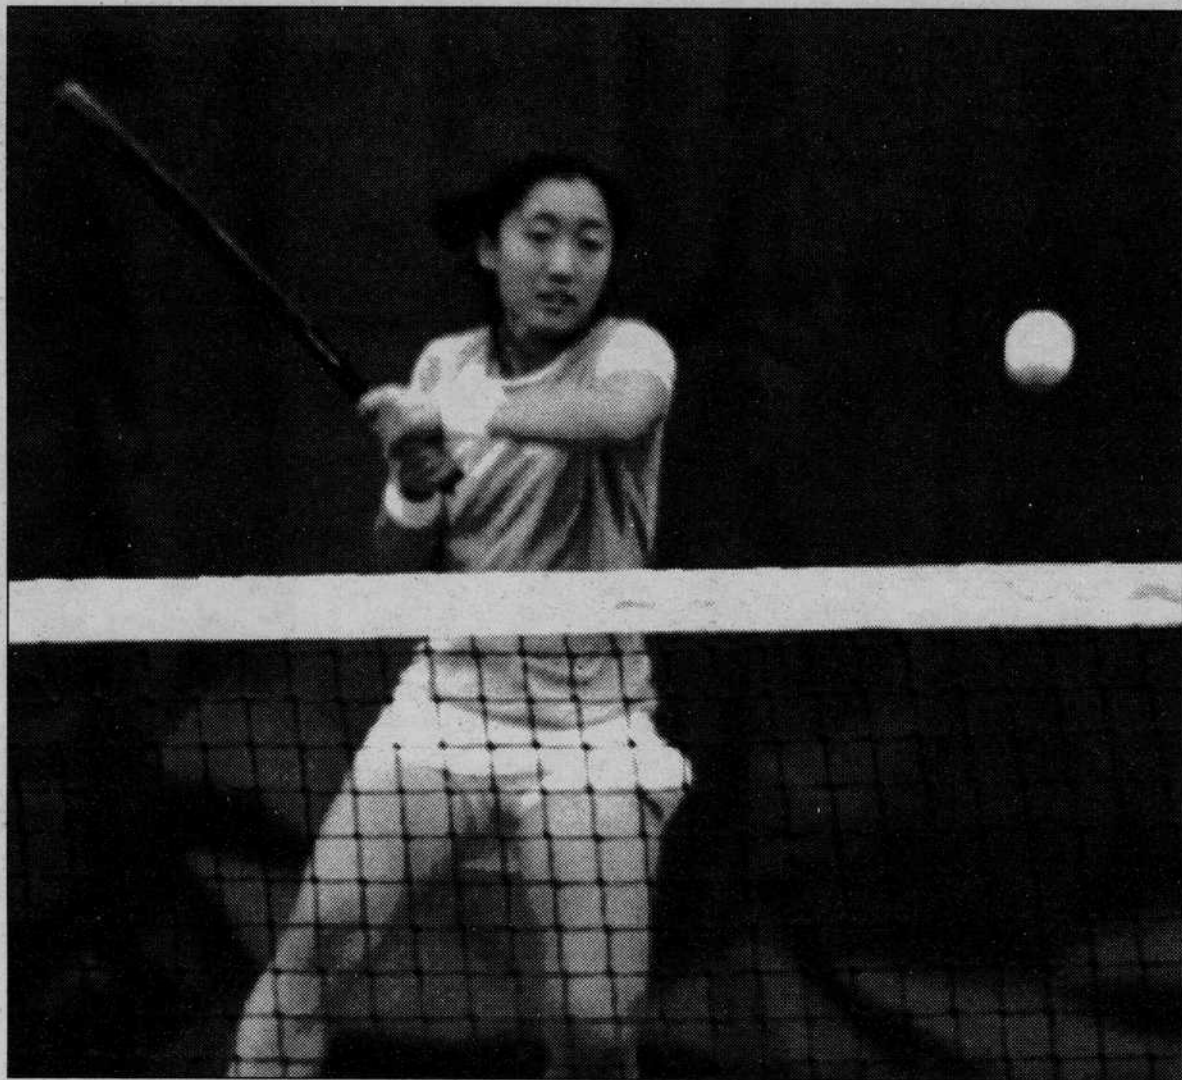

1. Learning at Aalborg is practical. Working in small groups, students use their knowledge to create innovative solutions to real-world problems. Aalborg-sponsored internships in Denmark and other European countries are also possible.
2. On the UO program at Aalborg University, most students spend about the same amount (including on airfare) as they would here at the UO. In a direct-exchange program between the UO and Aalborg University, UO students are charged no tuition by Aalborg. A UO study abroad fee (currently $400 per term) applies.
3. Aalborg offers entire semester programs in English. (We hear the Danish classes are pretty good, too!)
4. Students can use their UO financial aid awards toward expenses in Aalborg.
5. Students earn UO credit for courses taken at Aalborg.

Application forms and program information available at the Office of International Programs, 330 Oregon Hall. Or contact program coordinator Roger Adkins, 346-0518, radkins@oregon.uoregon.edu.

Hurry! Application deadline is Friday, March 15!

Oregon tennis plays well in doubles but falls twice

After twice putting themselves in position to win, the Oregon women's tennis team lost two matches during the weekend.

The Ducks lost 6-1 to No. 7 Arizona State and 5-2 to No. 44 Arizona as they opened the Pacific-10 Conference schedule.

"We played pretty well," head coach Jack Griffin said. "Both of these teams are very good, and at the end of the year, they'll both be in the top 20."

Against Arizona on Sunday, Oregon won two out of three doubles matches and jumped to a 1-0 lead before singles play.

Oregon freshman Ester Bak and senior Janice Nyland won a back-and-forth match, 9-7, over Maja Mlakar and Debbie Larocque of the Wildcats. Junior Monika Gieczys and senior Vickie Gunnarsson easily won their doubles match, 8-2.

"We played very tough in doubles," Nyland said. "And we put ourselves in a good position to beat this team."

The 1-0 lead quickly vanished for the Ducks in singles. Nyland lost her match to Mlakar 6-2, 6-2 and Bak lost her match 7-5, 6-3 to Marie-Pier Pouliot of the Wildcats. Oregon was then down 2-1. Gunnarsson won her match over Diane Hollands 6-3, 6-4 to even the score, 2-2.

"I was hitting the ball well and was getting a lot of depth," Gunnarsson said. "I was being aggressive, and I made most of my shots to put her away."

The Ducks looked to be in good position to win with the score tied at two and leading one set to none in each of the next three singles matches. Oregon only needed to win two of them.

But the Ducks failed to capitalize on the opportunity, losing all three.

"Our biggest problem today was the unforced errors," assistant coach Nils Schyllander said. "We gave them too many free points, and the good teams will take advantage of them and make you pay."

Oregon did play well in doubles, the matches that hurt them two weeks ago in Southern California.

"I am pleased that we were able to win the doubles point against two very good teams," Griffin said.

"Our doubles game is there," Nyland said. "Now we need to work on our singles, which is traditionally our strength."

Gunnarsson's win on Sunday was the only singles victory for the Ducks during the weekend. Against Arizona State on Friday, sophomores Davina Mendiburu and Courtney Nagle won their doubles match, 8-2, and Bak and Nyland won 8-6 to take the doubles point and a 1-0 lead.

The Ducks then lost all six singles matches in straight sets.

Oregon's record is now 6-3 overall and 0-2 in the Pac-10. The Ducks host Nevada at 5 p.m. Thursday.

"I'm happy with our effort this weekend," Schyllander said. "We put ourselves in position to beat two very good teams. If we continue to play with this intensity, especially in doubles, and clean up our errors, then we'll be able to beat teams of this caliber."

Court on Feb. 7.

It's a Stanford team that has no foreseeable end. They've already clinched the No. 1 seed in Pac-10 Tournament, and barring an upset, will most likely host a regional series in the NCAA version.

"Finally, I feel this is our year," Bethany Donaphin told the Stanford Daily. "Our team is so excited and we get along so well. The chemistry is better than its ever been. We kind of expected it (the conference championship) but it's still so sweet."

Bracket Baby

As most know, MacArthur Court will host the first ever women's Pac-10 Tournament, beginning March 1.

In the past, the team with the best overall record automatically won the conference's title and automatic entry into the NCAA Tournament. With the addition of the tournament, the team that goes all the way gets the bid, while the teams with the best regular season records fall in behind.

If the tournament started today, Arizona and Washington State would face off in the first game of the tournament, starting Friday, followed by UCLA and California.

The winner of UCLA-Cal would take on Stanford the next day, with Arizona State taking on the winner between the Wildcats and Cougars.

Washington would take on Oregon State in the game featuring seeds three and six, with USC and Oregon finishing up Saturday night at 8:15 p.m.

Whatever the result, the inaugural Pac-10 Tournament is shaping up to be an intense weekend of action.
