"Students are bombarded for three weeks with elections. It turns them off to voting and is hard to combat."

Elections

in part on a lack of ballot measures and student confusion that they had to vote in both a primary and a general election.

Hight said ballot measures asking for money attract more voters, and she heard of some students who thought the primary vote sealed the election.

But Hight lauded her board for their efforts this year to spread the word about elections early and often.

"We started recruiting early, at the end of last term," she said.

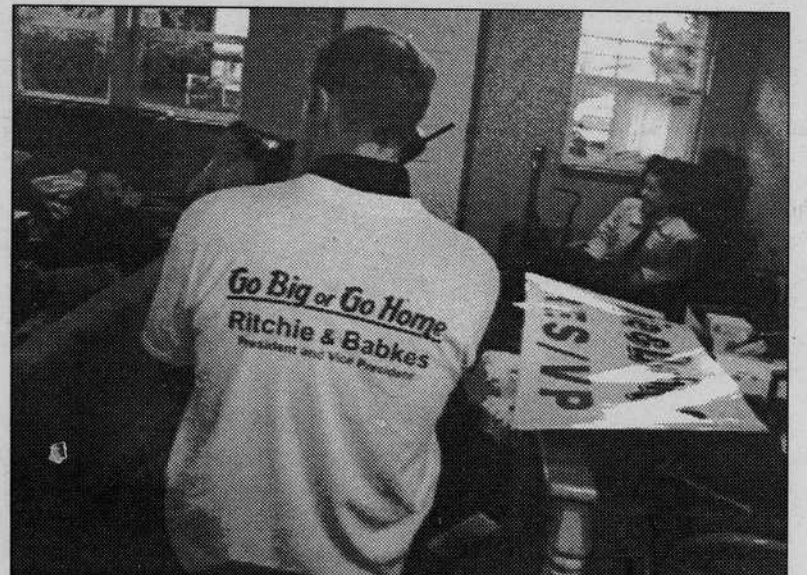

The elections board called its voter education seminars and candidates fairs in the residence halls, greek houses and student unions a success, and also gave credit to the diverse group of candidates running in the primary and general elections.

Grievances have halted the last three ASUO elections, sometimes multiple times, forcing the ASUO Constitution Court to untie the political knots before voting could resume. This year, the court dismissed the only grievance 20 minutes after voting ended Friday.

The court dismissed the case on a technicality because it was based on Oregon law only, and no ASUO rule was referenced. The justices wrote in the decision that the court can decide only on "questions arising under the ASUO Constitution."

Commentator publisher Bret Jacobson filed the grievance after elections board members refused to let media representatives witness last week's primary election vote tally. Jacobson, in his grievance, argued that the count fell under Oregon's Public Meetings Law and asked for a recount and the removal of the elections board.

Even Hight was dismayed that the court still didn't clarify the issue of media presence during ballot tallies.
