John Henry's

But John Henry's new space will also have benefits. Tracey said it's being designed with a longer bar, stadium seating for a better view of the stage, a large dance floor, plus plenty of parking. It's also in a location where patrons can "make a lot of noise."

Before John Henry's, the building was originally used as an auto repair shop. It's also been occupied by a teen disco called Club Hollywood and a 21-and-over bar called Club 136.

In August 1992, Tracey recalled how the opening night at John Henry's featured Cherry Poppin' Daddies and more than 200 fans. But it was a rough beginning for John Henry's.

Tracey said there were horse troughs filled with ice and bottled beer because the cooler wasn't hooked up yet. There wasn't video poker, hard alcohol or DJs, either.

Recently the bar has faced different obstacles, such as a loss of customers due to the smoking ban in Eugene bars.

"It's a big nuisance chasing people-around with cigarettes," Tracey said. Smoking "is what people do in bars. I'm in the business to satisfy my customers."

Stefanie Erickson, 24, who has been bartending at John Henry's during the day for more than a year, said she won't miss the stench that permeates her workplace. She pointed to a yellow banner above the bar that reads, "Music you can smell."

Erickson, a University junior, said she'll miss her daily conversations with the regulars. But she and about 20 other members of the staff plan to stick by John Henry's and work at its new location.

"I hope we take good energy and bring it over somewhere else," Tracey said. "But it's not going to look the same. We're not going to find another room like this."
