Roommates

by himself, he said.

For those unable to live alone, the next best alternative is to live with more than one other person, Malle advised. He cited statistics that show people who live with three or four roommates have better results.

"It helps to live with more than one other person because it provides more perspectives, which can be helpful with conflict resolution," he said.

Senior Jon Moch has lived with groups of friends, both men and women, and has found the mix of genders works well.

"It's good to have a nice balance of testosterone and estrogen. Otherwise, too much of one or the other can be overwhelming," he said.

While living with friends has generally worked well for Moch, he has experienced instances in which lifestyle differences have caused problems, particularly where drug use and pets were concerned.

One roommate had a bunny who became a problem once it hit puberty, Moch said. The bunny, Buster, became territorial, hissed and bit Moch, and defecated all over his room whenever he left his door open.

Moch said he is the kind of person who lets his problems fester, and his roommates tend to be the same way. According to Malle, the psychologist, that is exactly the way most bad roommate situations arise.

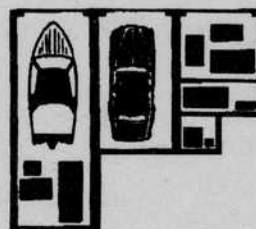

The major mistake people make in regards to roommate situations is that they think roommate success depends on matching personalities, Malle said.

"What causes the bad situations are escalations of lots of small things that haven't been talked about," Malle said. "People are fairly quick about making assumptions but often are surprised by how easily people can change."

According to Moch, the best advice when it comes to choosing roommates is to consider TV preferences.

"Don't get stuck with someone who wants to watch sports when you want to watch 'Sabrina (the Teenage Witch),' " he said.
