Campus-area offers communal living

University students have several options to choose from as they search for places to live next year

By Mikhael Romain
for the Emerald

As the end of the school year approaches, decisions about where to live in the fall loom before returning students. For those still mulling over their options, the University offers several communal living choices.

Residence halls

For many students, the residence halls are their first experience living on their own, and are an essential part of the college experience.

"It's a parent-free zone," said Faye Sweeney, a freshman in Spiller Hall. "It's an important part of freshman life. I have made most of my friends through the dorms."

The residence halls come complete with a communal television and study lounges, laundry facilities and a weekly meal plan. The short walk to class, high-speed Internet connection and cable television service are convenient, but for some, late-night noise can become an issue.

"I hear people playing their Britney Spears music at two in the morning, and
