'Crazy job-seeker' off to D.C.

When Nelly Ganesan walks down the street, "Nine hundred people say, 'Hi,'" said her friend Maggie Young, a senior.

GANESAN

One reason Ganesan, a senior graduating in economics with a minor in computer information technology, is so well known is because she's been involved in so many student activities during her four years at the University.

Ganesan worked for the Ambassador Program for two years, and this year she supervised 24 other students. She was a peer adviser for economics, she served as an officer for Students of the Indian Subcontinent from 1999 to 2001, she's been actively involved in International Student Association events and culture nights and she's worked in the ASUO.

Ganesan was born and raised in Alaska, but she visits southern India, where her parents grew up, every few years.

She was drawn to economics after studying in India for two years in seventh and eighth grades, she said. She's most interested in economic growth and development in Third World countries, especially after seeing the poverty firsthand, she said.

"With the family background I have in India, there was a developed interest after visiting the country and seeing how the people lived, and then comparing that to what was taught in my classes," she said.

Thanks to Ganesan's initiative — she was "a crazy job-seeker on the Internet" — she is headed to Washington, D.C., to be a research assistant for the National Academy of Social Insurance, a nonprofit research and education organization that supports Congress' decisions about workers' compensation, welfare and Social Security.

Staying loyal to recycling efforts

Even as a fourth-grader, Leona Kassel believed one person could help change the world. After learning in school about how elephants were killed for their tusks, she launched a campaign from her house against the practice, hanging a poster on her front door with fliers people could take that said, "Don't Buy Ivory."

KASSEL

College hasn't changed her idealism. An Honors College student with a double major in environmental studies and philosophy, Kassel, 22, just finished her 80-page thesis last week about humans' responsibility to the environment.

Kassel, who's worked at Campus Recycling three of the four years since she was a freshman, said some people have told her that trying to save the environment is futile, but she said she'd rather take action than give up.

"If your options are to sit there and watch the environment get destroyed or at least educate people and make facilities more accessible, I'd choose the latter," she said.

A program she began while working at CR is to educate freshmen about recycling by taking resident assistants on tours of campus recycling facilities so they can then take students in their residence halls on a similar tour.

Kassel has also led a group of students in a successful effort to incorporate the Graduation Pledge of Social and Environmental Responsibility into commencement activities this year.

After she graduates this week, she plans to move to Hawaii, where she studied last year through the National Student Exchange program. She's applied for the one open position in recycling facilities there, but she said if she doesn't get it, "I'm going to create my own job."

How 'involved' have you been?

Fifth-year senior Rashida Haqq is getting ready to graduate next week with a bachelor's degree in sociology, a job promotion waiting in the wings and only a single regret for the half-decade she has studied at the University.

Born in Chicago and raised in Portland, Haqq, 23, lived with her mom, her younger brother and her two younger sisters until she came to Eugene to study at the University.

Haqq is a current member of Zeta Phi Beta sorority, the Black Student Union, Black Women of Achievement, and the Office of Multicultural Affairs. She has been a BWA treasurer and is currently Zeta Phi Beta's president.
