20 years Serving Our Patrons

Strickland

mixed Osage-Cherokee children. From an early age, Strickland learned the importance of scholarship and had the encouragement he needed to pursue his goals.

And now, Strickland works to guide others.

"There's no question I give people advice," he said. "My mother says if I was as good at knowing what I should do as I am at telling other people what they should do, we'd all be a better off."

"So I may be a bit bossy."

But everyone has their own style, and Strickland's colleagues said the University was fortunate to be under his direction.

"Rennard did an outstanding job," presiding law school Dean Laird Kirkpatrick said. "He finished the fundraising for the new building and helped get the law school moved into one of the most beautiful and technologically advanced law buildings in the country."

And despite being blissfully boastful when asked about his accomplishments, which include writing and editing a federal handbook many consider the definitive reference on American Indian law, Strickland tends to spend a majority of his time quietly operating outside the limelight.

"He's a relatively low-key person who works quietly but directly on trying to get things done," O'Fallon said.

Perhaps that is because Strickland has always known academia was his niche. His contributions across the nation are many, yet Strickland has the uncanny ability to know when to let go.

"I really believe it's important that leadership have vitality," he said of his departure as dean.

But no matter what endeavor Strickland takes on, he always has his trusty sidekick — law — on his side.

"I really enjoy the law and particularly the way in which the law works itself out in the lives of individuals," he said.

And, certainly, it has worked out marvelously for him and for those he touches.

"I think if you're a good teacher," Strickland said, "you encourage students to reach deep into themselves and find what is there."
