Shaul Cohen, the Chair of Faculty Advising, speaks at a memorial held at the EMU Amphitheater of the constructive discourse that the events of Sept. 11, 2001, have allowed through the campus community.

A time of remembrance

Editor's note: On Sept. 11, 2002, the University community, the Eugene-Springfield community and the nation as a whole gathered in different ways to commemorate the attacks of one year earlier. Many gatherings were held in our area in parks, public spaces, churches and homes. Here is a small sampling of the events.

University of Oregon

The University held a Campus Remembrance Program at the EMU Amphitheater on the one-year anniversary of the terrorist attacks to commemorate those who died on Sept. 11 and to share experiences as a community.

The event sounded off with the ringing of carillon music. A short program commenced with speakers, including University President Dave Frohnmayer and ASUO President Rachel Pilliod.

The enormous flagpole standing near the EMU Amphitheater hung at half mast, and a crowd of about 300 attended.

"As we gather here today, we will be able to focus on the changes that occurred," Pilliod said. "Let us serve our peers, family and community by striving to educate ourselves and others."

Eugene Fire & EMS Department District Chief Taylor Robertson also stood by for the ceremony in full uniform.

"We're mostly here to support this occasion and to let people know that we care about them — the people that we serve," said Robertson, who heads District 1, which includes the University.

Many of the speakers expressed hope for the future, conveying the kind of caring and optimism of which Robertson spoke.

"The theme for the ceremony (was) to focus on the good that has come out of Sept. 11," Pilliod said.

"I think that it's important for students, as it reflects our ability to build on the lessons that we have learned from the tragedy, and to focus (students) toward breaking down the barriers and perceived differences among us," she said.

Sept. 11 is a day that will forever mark calendars, and speakers noted the significance the event had for many people.

"We did not ask for this anniversary," Frohnmayer said. "Yet I'm sure that each and every one of us remembers where we were and what we were doing a year ago."

Frohnmayer also listed some of the possible good that came of the terrorist attacks, saying that a positive outlook is a way of creating joy and understanding out of tragedy.

"This is one of the times when we can say that what a University does is particularly important," he said, "because what we try to do is understand ourselves and others."

Eugene-Springfield

The cities of Eugene and Springfield made their own attempt Sept. 11 to commemorate the calamity that struck the world on that Tuesday in 2001.

At 6:45 p.m., approximately 350 people filed into Springfield's Island Park, not just to remember what happened last year, but also to begin to forget it.

Candlelight vigils, speeches, prayers and tears were all a part of the process for firefighters, police officers, public officials, Boy Scouts and area residents who needed to commemorate and begin the closure process on this tragic event.

"The time to mourn the events of last year has passed, it is time to rebuild," Eugene Fire Chief Tom Tallon said.

University President Dave Frohnmayer suggested that to seek closure, community members must rely on each other.

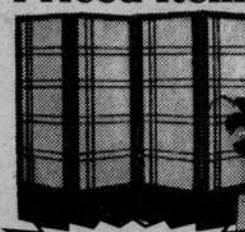

"Some have accused us of taking part in an orgy of competitive sorrow," he said. But "we need our community to take refuge in."
