not have been involved," she said. Another roadblock is the long and complicated process of recommending a change to the conduct code and getting it approved by the state.

In the meantime, Leavitt hopes to work with the city, police, Oregon Liquor Control Commission, neighborhoods and students to prevent future disturbances.

"I foresee a lot more work with prevention and education," she said. Some think University's reputation may also be at stake as officials plan preventative measures.

Leavitt said riots hurt the University's image and affect potential students' choice to attend the University.

"I think (these events) hurt the University's reputation, and it hurts Eugene's reputation," Leavitt said. "I think people will be watching to see how seriously we take it."

To successfully resolve the problem, Leavitt is seeking student input on prevention. She can be reached at aleavitt@oregon.uoregon.edu.

and delay telling the homeowner afterwards if a judge deems it necessary. Roving wiretap authority was also expanded to include "intelligence" wiretaps. Under this provision, the Foreign Intelligence Surveillance Court may wiretap any device the suspect could be using.

Although Marston said city and county recognition is the first step toward complete repeal of the act, Oregon officials said the resolution would not change policy.

The proposal "would have no effect on the U.S. Attorney's office in terms of us doing our jobs," said Chris Cardani, assistant U.S. attorney based in Oregon. Cardani previously wasn't aware of the committee's efforts to abolish the act.

Gery VanderMeer, communications coordinator for the Republican Party of Lane County, said while sections of the act could still use revision, passing an anti-terrorism measure was essential. "In light of the events of Sept. 11, it was necessary for Congress to act to plug holes in the national security dike," he said.

One Oregon senator said the Patriot Act hasn't raised any concerns.

Chris Matthews, spokesman for Sen. Gordon Smith, R-Ore., said Smith is generally concerned about possible loss of liberties, but hasn't seen any specific issues that worry him. Smith was one of 98 senators who voted in favor of the act.

But Marston said problems already have arisen.

"We have immigrants and citizens being indefinitely detained," she said. "It's wrong, absolutely wrong."

The committee's efforts have received endorsements from the Eugene Human Rights Commission and the Democratic Party of Lane County.

Human Rights Analyst Mary Feldman said the Eugene HRC endorsed the efforts of the Committee, but sent the resolution to an agenda committee for review.

The HRC "is very supportive of the group's efforts," Feldman said, but "they didn't feel comfortable endorsing a specific document until they were able to read the background information."

Students and community members interested in learning more about the committee can contact Hope Marston at 683-5634, or by e-mail at hmarston@epud.net.
