work, they need a computer — ideally a laptop — and a wireless card. Cards for both PCs and Macs can be purchased at the University Bookstore and other retailers and can cost anywhere from $60 to $150.

Albrich said the most common issue causing problems for students is differences in operating systems and software. However, Microcomputing Services in 151 McKenzie can help any student, faculty or staff member with wireless connections free of charge.

Network Services Director Dale

Smith said the University wireless network currently supports devices conforming to the 802.11b standard. Students must be careful when purchasing their wireless cards to check the box and make sure "802.11b" is printed on it so the card will be compatible.

Students can get access to the wireless network without spending a lot of money by borrowing a wireless card from the Documents Room, 175 McKenzie. Students are required to leave a $20 deposit when they borrow a card, but they receive a full refund after returning it.

Lab assistant Chris Diaz said that on a weekly basis, about 10 students use the lending service. Diaz said that overall, students are pleased with the speed of wireless Ethernet but would like more locations across campus to have access to the wireless network.

Before new locations are ready to provide access to the wireless network, several things must be accomplished Smith said. First, Network Services must survey the building to determine the best place to establish an access point because concrete, steel and books can interfere with signal strength.

After the access point location has been selected, Network Services must establish a hard-wired network connection and test the coverage.

Smith said establishing new access points takes about eight hours of labor. He said the technology is becoming increasingly popular, but it costs about $2,500 to make a new location ready for wireless Internet.

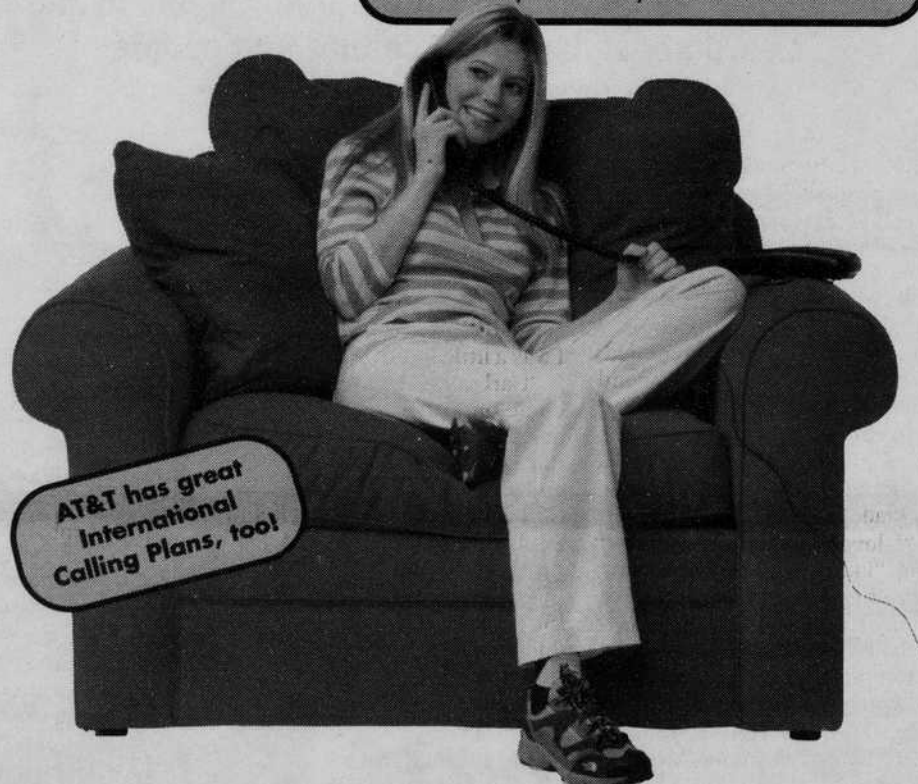

"Almost every University is doing this," said Smith. "Additionally, you will find airports, Starbucks and any place folks hang out are doing this."
