Control Commission.

"I've demonstrated to the Oregon electorate and political machine that libertarianism is on the rise ... and we're appealing to the electorate," Cox said on election night.

House District 8

By a 7,484 to 3,135 margin, area voters returned Prozanski to Oregon's House of Representatives Tuesday night, as he defeated Republican McNeill in the District 8 race.

Prozanski, who previously represented some areas of House District 8 before he was termed-out, credited his win to his "previous experience and long-term commitment to the community."

With a mounting budget deficit and many difficult choices facing the Oregon Legislature, Prozanski would like to see a more moderate approach from both parties.

"We're going to have to build relationships within the chambers and reach across the aisles and work along the same lines," Prozanski said.

McNeill, a 21-year-old political science major, ran his first public-office election on student-representation platform and hoped to capture votes from the University-area within the 8th District.

"It was an uphill battle from the beginning," he said. "This campaign never got any momentum."

McNeill would not speculate on his plans for the future, but admitted he may be mulling a run for the city council or attempting to another run for House District 8.

"I think politics is definitely in the future," he said.

Oregon Senate District 4

Voters of Oregon's Senate District 4 returned Corcoran to the Senate by 2,000 votes over Republican Alsup.

Democratic Corcoran previously served two terms in the Oregon House, and first won his Senate seat in 1999. Corcoran ran on a platform of creating a more progressive state tax structure. He could not be reached for comment election night.

Republican Alsup, a care provider and family farmer, ran on reducing the size of state government and providing affordable health care for seniors and low-income people.
