to begin building.

The site the University chose for the structure, at the corner of East 17th Avenue and Moss Street, is a residential area, and in order to obtain a permit, the University must comply with certain criteria.

These criteria involve specific standards for the building's appearance, mostly that it fit in with the surrounding neighborhood, Associate City Planner Kent Kullby told the Emerald on July 9.

The Fairmount neighborhood is a medium-density area, so the University's plans for the building must blend in with the overall small building size.

Some of the neighbors said that the proposed structure did not meet these stipulations.

"I think it's institutional, and it doesn't fit the character (of the neighborhood) very well," Osanka told the Emerald on Aug. 6.

The University still must apply for site approval and construction permits in order to progress with other aspects of the project.

"We've gotten this far," University planning consultant and applicant representative Terri Harding said. "It's just taking the steps in the process one bit at a time."

Lesbian, Gay, Bisexual, Transgender, Queer Alliance said she felt sympathy for people's concerns, but said those concerns may be unfounded.

"The safety issue here is the safety of trans men and women," she said. "Trans people don't represent a threat."

Shaw-Phillips said she felt the domestic partner registry was important but wasn't sure if it would be worth excluding public accommodation for transgender people.

"Transgender people get left behind a lot," she said.
