GLOSS sponsors language panel

GLOSS, the linguistics graduate student organization, is sponsoring a discussion panel called "Oppressed Languages Around the World Today" as a part of the Fall 2002 Linguistics Colloquium Series. The discussion panel will take place today at 7 p.m. in the EMU Walnut Room.

The panel will explore topics relating to language oppression, including how widespread language oppression can be and how it can affect communities. American Indian, Chicano, deaf and international perspectives on language oppression will be explored at the discussion.

Students, staff, faculty and members of the Department of Linguistics are encouraged to attend the panel and participate in the discussion.

bulletin boards around campus. Even with this requirement, Western Oregon officials do not require groups to put the official logo on the posters.

"It's not anything that anybody has felt should be a requirement for student programs and activities," said Jim Adams, public relations director for Western Oregon.

Eastern Oregon University, Southern Oregon University and the Oregon Institute of Technology only require student groups to append logos on publications going off campus.

Eastern Oregon graphic designer Kevin Smith said student group publications distributed off-campus must carry the official logo, while publications that stay on-campus do not. Despite the open on-campus policy, Smith estimated that 95 percent of publications carry the logo anyway.

"We try not to dictate policy to them too much," he said.

Southern Oregon public relations coordinator Christina Dunlap said they encourage student groups to use the logo on their publications, but the policy is not enforced for student groups.

"We don't punish them if they don't carry the logo," she said. "We don't have any kind of thing in place that forces them to use the logo."
