"The artifacts are different from more famous images you see from the Cultural Revolution," Larson said. "The images created an aesthetic of how you should live your life during the Cultural Revolution."

Larson will show the film "In the Heat of the Sun" and lead a discussion afterwards. She said the movie depicts the Cultural Revolution from the perspective of teenagers living through it. The viewing will take place on Friday at 7 p.m. in the Hult Center's Studio One.

A major focus of the show is education. The UO Museum of Art put on workshops that trained high school educators on teaching the Cultural Revolution. Katie Sproles, who works for the museum, said that 10 high school students have been trained and are giving tours of the exhibit throughout the month.

"Education is a very large part of our mission," Sproles said. "This is an opportunity for the museum to interact with the public while the building is closed."

A lecture and slide presentation titled "Fading Images: My Life as a 'Reeducated Youth' in My Sketchbooks" will take place Nov. 24 in Studio One of the Hult Center at 2 p.m. Gu Xiong, a professor of fine arts from the University of British Columbia, will give the presentation.

Both the slide presentation and movie showing are free and open to the public.

"The exhibit is a wonderful way to learn about a different country and different time period," Sproles said. "It's the first show of its kind in the United States, and so we're lucky to have it in Eugene."
