he's a real smooth guy. He has real good moves," Campbell said. "He sees the field very well. He has a good feel for where defenders are and makes nice cuts."

Getting to Eugene wasn't easy for Whitehead. Originally signed in 2001, he had to sit out last season because his entrance exam score was challenged. After two games this season, though, an anonymous tip from the NCAA put Whitehead's eligibility in question again, forcing him to miss the final two preseason games before taking another entrance test.

Now surely entrenched on the Oregon roster — and the man tabbed to replace Smith should he opt for the NFL after this season — Whitehead is no longer getting headaches from entrance exams. Instead, he's creating the headaches on the field.

"I see myself as a playmaker," Whitehead said. "I see myself putting up some big numbers for the Ducks."

While Whitehead provides the fitness, Shaw is the power.

The son of former a former NFL player, Shaw is finally getting his chance to carry the load. In a losing effort against Washington last week, the 5-foot-11, 201-pounder had his best game in a Duck uniform, leading the Ducks with 42 yards on seven carries, a 6-yard average.

"I've been waiting for my opportunity for awhile," Shaw said. "I'm just trying to make my reps count."

"I have faith that everything will work out."

His father, Pete Shaw, played eight seasons as a cornerback for the San Diego Chargers and New York Giants. But Shaw said he never felt pressured to play football, which he picked up as a freshman in high school.

"I just can't say enough about him," Campbell said of Shaw. "Ryan's a quick guy with a little more power than Terrence. Right now, I'd venture to say that (Shaw's) running a little bit faster right now because he's healthy. Unfortunately, he hasn't gotten to play a whole lot this year, but fortunately he's got fresh legs because of it."

At La Costa Canyon High School in Carlsbad, Calif., Shaw tallied 2,580 yard and 33 touchdowns in his final two seasons. Upon coming to Oregon, though, Shaw faced the challenge of competing for playing time against the likes of Smith and Morris. As a freshman, he participated in just
