it has anything to do with an Oregon resident," she said.

Margosian said her office uses fines and collection agencies to punish violators.

"Sometimes getting to their money can bring a company to the table quicker than throwing them in jail," she said.

Justin Criddle, CEO of Affinity Marketing, a telemarketing firm based in Eugene, said the No Call list can be programmed into the company's computerized dialing system, which makes it easy for the company to comply with the law.

Criddle said he'd like the opportunity to talk to people who don't want to be called, but understands that some people don't want to be bothered.

"We respect people's privacy," he said.

Telemarketers may lose money because of the law, but it's not worth risking a fine by violating it, he said.

"It is a potential lost sale," he said. "It's also a potential for a headache."
