Measure 28

to find alternative sources of funding and volunteers to maintain services.

In Lane County, proposed budget cuts translate into a loss of 52 beds at adult mental health facilities and 18 beds at alcohol and drug treatment centers.

White Bird Clinic coordinator Robert Dritz said 40 percent of his clients won't be able to get treatment if Measure 28 fails.

"People are pretty resilient, but once they get knocked down a couple times, they have a hard time getting back up," Dritz said. "Our capacity to help goes down, but the lines just get longer."

The University's Crisis Center, which provides a crisis line for students and the public, remains unaffected by state budget cuts. Counseling and psychology doctoral student George Hanawahine said student volunteers receive about 100 calls a month from people in crisis situations. Hanawahine said cuts to community crisis centers means more people may turn to the University's 24-Hour Student Crisis Line for help.

Developmental Director of Willamette Family Treatment Services Pat Skipper said cuts to alcohol and drug treatment programs have already crippled services. Skipper said funds raised by Measure 28's passage would help stop the reduction of services and keep people off the streets. Willamette will lose 11 beds if the Measure 28 fails, Skipper added.

"We see so much that goes on because of addiction — not just crime, but domestic violence and child abuse," Skipper said. "Without beds, we won't be able to treat people."
