was given a stone to do an alternative setting project."

Students were not allowed to set the stones in prongs or bezel, which is how the precious stones are placed in most conventional jewelry.

University alumna Devienna Anggraini created a piece for the show.

"The assignment started with the question 'What does blue mean to you?'" Anggraini said. "And we knew the work was going to be in an exhibit titled 'Blue.'"

For her project, Anggraini created a silver, half-inch square box, which can be unfolded to display

"It's got a lot of original thought in every piece. It's a nice touch of having the sapphire theme."

the stone, connected to a small silver chain.

"You always see stones being set in jewelry in a certain way, this is pushing the boundaries of what is traditional," Anggraini said. "People go wild. They put it in epoxy, create a little cage."

Other students set the stones into necklaces and rings. One student used felt to create a sculpture, another used human hair.

Student Jesse Burke-Allmon attended the opening last Monday.

"There's a wide selection of work," he said of the exhibit. "I like it, especially the metalsmithing. It's got a lot of original thought in every piece. It's a nice touch of having the sapphire theme."

Steepy said she was pleased with the students' ability to display the stones in an unconventional way.

"I'm impressed with all the work," she said. "It's a good example of student work across the board."

"Blue" will be on display in the LaVerne Krause Gallery until Friday.
