Zinn lecture has been relocated

Students with tickets to Howard

Zinn's Friday "Terrorism and War" lecture should be aware that the event will be held in the McDonald Theatre, located at 1010 Willamette St., rather than the originally planned Columbia Hall location. The famous political speaker and author of "A People's History of the United States" will speak at 7 p.m., and tickets are sold out.

officers (answer: 14), and what is the most important part of Senate Rules Section 5, which lists senators' duties?

Andrew Faust did not respond to repeated requests for an interview.

Laura Schulthies is a junior journalism major. She didn't know the senate's quorum requirement to elect officers, but she did know that Senate Rules Section 5 included senate duties.

Q: How will you figure out how to spend the surplus?

Schulthies: Well, I want to work with the girl who is currently holding the office. And I'm going to try and attend some of their current meetings to see where they're going, because I know that they have already established a plan. And a source to where they want to work in the same direction and deal with the same people and just continue their goals. So I want to be able to go in, take over what they're doing and just do the best that I can and try to make it — you know, make the funds go as far as they can and be as effective as they can be.

Q: How do you plan on interacting with student groups?

Schulthies: Well, I know a lot of people in greek life and also in other different groups around the University, and so I would just really pick up my involvement with them and maybe try and contact them on a monthly basis see how they feel about what's going on and if they're informed on it. Just try to keep everybody up to date on what's going on. So they appreciate it more and understand it better.

Q: What are the most important issues facing the students you'd represent?

Schulthies: Well, athletes have a lot of issues in my opinion. They are always in all of our sports that are represented by the University and also the Club Sports, they're always pushing for more funds and stretching their budgets as much as they can just because we are limited to the funds that we're allotted. And so really I would just try to find out what their biggest needs are and what their biggest concerns are and meet those to the best of my ability.

University Director of Admissions Martha Pitts said it was possible that the increase could affect enrollment, but she added the University was working with student financial aid packages to help ensure adequate funding for needy students.

Elizabeth Bickford, director of the University Financial Aid Office, said the federal financial aid program has failed to keep pace with rising tuition costs. Bickford added that this inadequacy has placed additional stress on the students and the University.

According to the OUS 2003-04 proposed tuition rates fact sheet, all OUS schools will set aside $6.1 million to fund financial aid for low-income students.

The University Financial Aid Office has already received an onslaught of student aid applications. Roughly 200 more applications have already been received than at this time last year, Bickford said.

"We have grant money for the neediest students, and basically all students can apply for federal loans," she said, adding that federal loans, however, have failed to keep up with tuition increases.

Current University students should receive notification of their federal financial aid awards by April 15.

Shona music, has performed on the Market Stage about eight times and will occupy the 3 p.m. "dance band" slot Saturday.

LaFollette called the market a "family party" and said the event is a fun place to perform.

"Like a lot of venues, I think it is a really good opportunity for musicians to play," he said. "There's always a fun crowd, particularly on opening day."

Still agreed.

"The thing that makes the market very different from a clubhouse or a bar is that it's outdoors, where there is sort of an unusual, wide audience, from kids to grandparents," Still said. "There are all ranges of income and interests."

She added that bands can often build a fan base from their market performances.

"Your chances of finding someone who just loves your music are pretty good," she said. "It always amazes me. ... There's always somebody. Sometimes lots of somebodies."
