cidental fee money goes on campus, and each year hundreds of thousands of fee dollars go to many organizations to pay for membership and other services at the University.

Rep. Linda Flores, R-Boring, who sponsored the bill, did not return phone calls from the Emerald.

ASUO State Affairs Coordinator Adam Petkun, who attended a public hearing on the bill last week, said the feeling against the bill was so "overwhelming" that he doubted it would see a work session in the future.

"The fee is so important to us because it allows for all thoughts and all expression on campus to be alive," he said. "Without the fee, students would just get the bare-bones academic experience."

Since its inception, the bill has drawn fire from many sources in college administrations and student governments in OUS, including ASUO President Rachel Pilliod, University President Dave Frohnmayer and OUS Chancellor Richard Jarvis.

In a letter to legislators, Frohnmayer told members of the House General Government Committee that the student incidental fee process provides students at the University with "essential campus programs and services."

"The student incidental fee provides an essential learning experience for students, and is a process that has been managed effectively and responsibly on the campus level," he wrote. "I urge you to carefully consider House Bill 3600 and return the current student choice model."

The U.S. Supreme Court upheld the constitutionality of students controlling the distribution of their student fees two years ago in Southworth v. University of Wisconsin. Now, opponents of House Bill 3600 say it would violate that ruling.

Unless the bill is granted a work session in the Legislature, it will die when the current legislative session ends.

by Islamic clerics, it has a strong reformist element that openly challenges authority.

For the moment at least, the United States feels content in making the Tehran regime extremely nervous about the presence of American forces on its borders. That reality could help moderate the government's extremism and enhance the power of reformers in the country, analysts say.

In Tehran, Iranian President Mohammad Khatami reflected some of this concern in a news conference on Wednesday. He said his country would not accept a U.S.-installed regime in Iraq and will support Syria if it is attacked. But there was a caveat: "We will defend Syria, but that doesn't mean we will engage in military confrontation," he said.
