advocacy process while they were engaged in it and to respect it when it's over. He said lawyers should be willing to push the legitimate limits of advocacy, but they must also respect those limits — and they should always maintain their integrity.

"You most precious commodity is your credibility," Boies said. He said no matter how hard a lawyer works, if they lost their credibility they also lose their effectiveness.

He also told the graduates not to be afraid of losing cases.

"Everyone who plays baseball knows that you can't have home runs if you're not prepared to strike out," Boies said. "Don't be afraid to take on hard cases that may cause you to fall, stumble, lose."

Boies said there is an enormous amount of work to do in the various spheres, not only to create change, but also to maintain the gains that have already been accomplished.

Another honorable guest included Oregon University System Chancellor Richard Jarvis. Jarvis thanked the graduates for their contributions to learning and teaching.

"You as students help to shape what we as faculty do," Jarvis said.

Graduate and Student Bar Association President Jodee Leigh Scott said one of the memorable aspects of law school was how students supported each other in their work.

"We created a different environment, a community where we care about each other and call each other friends," Scott said. Even as students tackled academic challenges, they also saw each other through engagements, marriages, divorces, childbirth and other intricacies of life.

Scott advised the new lawyers to make wise choices as they start working in the real world.

"How do you change the world? Well, there are so many ways, and for that the choice is ours," Scott said.

Vice President of Academic Affairs Lorraine Davis conferred the degrees on behalf of President Dave Frohnmayer, who could not attend the ceremony. In a written message, Frohnmayer said graduates should strive to touch lives for the better.

"May you always regard the profession as one of service," Frohnmayer said in his statement.

Siskiyou

Initiative. If implemented, the HFI would open the Siskiyou to massive logging in the name of fire prevention.

"In my 20 years of experience, I have never seen a more brutal and vicious attack on wild lands," Gold said. "The initiative is pretty much a sham. It is just a welfare program for the timber industry. ... The Bush administration went out and tried to orchestrate people's fears and turn them against nature."

Gold said he believes that in order to protect the forests, it is necessary to form relationships, both with the woods and with other people. For Gold, this relationship is best expressed through the telling of stories. He said there are two main themes in the stories being told about nature today: One is that nature is dangerous and exists for our exploitation; the other is that nature is our ally.

"This is about which story people are going to enter into," Gold said. "Are we going to have an economy of war or an economy of peace? Both will make money, but different people will make money."

Survival Center co-Director Ashlee Harrison said in an e-mail that the main objective of the Siskiyou Project is "to get the region permanently protected by turning it into a National Park/Reserve."

Harrison said Gold gave an amazing presentation about his efforts and the beauty of the Siskiyou when he visited the University in the fall.

The presentation will be tonight at 7:30 in the EMU Fir Room. It is free and open to the public.
