baby, continue with the pregnancy and give the baby up for adoption or terminate the pregnancy.

According to a study by the Allen Guttmacher Institute, one in five abortions are performed on women attending college. The study also indicated that while pregnancy rates dropped for teenagers between 1994 and 2000, the abortion rate for college-age women did not.

Jones said very few of her patients opt for adoption, and most decide to terminate the pregnancy. Jones said she can refer students to abortion providers in Eugene, and though the closing of All Women's Health Services last summer limited local availability, women seeking abortions do not have to go out of Campus pregnancy facts

- 16.5% of students surveyed have been pregnant or have impregnated someone town to find a doctor.

Jones said she also refers students who choose abortion to the Counseling Center for grief counseling, and she said she's always aware of students who could be potentially isolated and lack support from their partner or family and friends.

"It's important to work through the grief now," she said. "The more they deal now, the less likely it will traumatize them in the future."

would improve safety of DPS officers by hopefully leading to prompt resolution of problems. DPS officers would not have to sit and wait for Eugene police."

Student government officials are not as excited as Hicks is about the prospect of DPS issuing citations on campus, however.

ASUO President Maddy Melton has been working with DPS and other involved parties to determine whether DPS officers should be given more jurisdiction on campus. Melton said the ASUO has been struggling to make sure student voices are included in any decisions, and added that the issue had been kept rather quiet and many students are unaware of the attempts to change the city code.

"Because it's so late in the game, we're not sure about what can be done about the policy being passed," Melton said. "If the policy is passed by the city, it will be up to the University to decide how it is implemented."

Melton said a DPS advisory board with six student members and five University staff members has recently been formed to offer comments on student-related issues.

"We will be working to make sure the implementation has student input," she said.

Melton and ASUO staff may still have a little time to make their opinions heard, however. Ward 3 City Councilor David Kelly said the city had not formally heard from the University about possible changes to the city code.

"The city is involved at a staff level, but nothing has come to the City Council at this point," Kelly said. "The first step in implementing this would be a City Council work session, followed by a public hearing."

According to the City Council agenda, a work session has not yet been scheduled, but officials at the University said they expect to go before the City Council in mid-July, and DPS officers could begin issuing citations by fall term, if not sooner.

The World of Fiction: Serial Killer Cinema

CRN 40415 • 4 credits • 1-2:50 MUWH • 300 Villard • Daxton Norton

In this course, we will examine how pop psychology attempts to construct and explain the behavior of those classified as serial killers; using that discourse as a tool, we will decipher and map these motifs as they surface in selected films, including M., Psycho, Silence of the Lambs, and Seven.
