reduce emissions.

Survey results also show that a majority of Republicans, conservatives, Democrats and liberals support most climate-change policies.

One of the most surprising findings was the strong, bipartisan support for action," Anthony Leiserowitz, a principal investigator for the study, said in a press release.

Leiserowitz did not return phone calls as of press time.

The mail survey was funded by the National Science Foundation a governmental organization that supports scientific research - and included a mail questionnaire sent to 673 adults in a random sample of all 50 states. Policy results were compiled from a sampling of 92 per-cent of Americans who had heard of global warming. The researchers also concluded that a margin of error of plus or minus 4 percent existed for results based on the total sample of adults.

The survey comes on the heels of the National Energy Plan, which is currently being debated in the U.S. Senate. U.S. Sens. John McCain, R-Ariz., and Joe Lieberman, D-Conn., recently introduced an amendment to the plan that would reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

Nathaniel N-T, a co-director of the Responsible Consumer Network and a member of the University Survival Center, said he still considers greenhouse gas emissions a "huge issue" but doubts that 80 percent of Americans are truly concerned about the issue.

"I don't believe 80 percent of Americans are really doing anything to reduce greenhouse gas emissions," he said.

Kristie Greco, spokeswoman for U.S. Rep. Peter DeFazio, D-Ore., said DeFazio hopes the new amend-

Global warming survey

92 percent of 673 people surveyed said they had heard about global warming. A few results from the survey include:

 More than 90 percent say the United States should reduce its greenhouse gas emissions.

77 percent support government regulation of carbon dioxide as a pollutant.

 71 percent support investment in renewable energy.

= 88 percent support the yoto Protocol of reducing emissions.

• 76 percent believe the United States should reduce greenhouse gas emissions regardless of whether other countries do so.

54 percent support a tax on "gas guzzlers."

78 percent oppose a gasoline tax, and 60 percent oppose a business energy tax to reduce greenhouse gas emissions.

ment to reduce greenhouse gases will be included in the National Energy Plan bill.

Congressman DeFazio definitely believes that global warming is an international crisis, and it's important to work to reduce emissions," she said.
