Jerry Matson and the Oregon linebacking corps will be invaluable in Friday's game against Utah. Oregon's Igor Olshansky described Utah's diversified attack as a variation of the wishbone offense. Utah will run the ball, evidenced by the fact that Brandon Warfield has already run for 563 yards on the ground this season. Matson is important because of the need to close up the middle of the Utes' rushing attack. If he, Kevin Mitchell and David Martin can help plug the middle, it will force Warfield to the outside where Olshansky and Devan Long will be waiting on both ends. If that potent Utah rushing attack — Warfield is ranked fifth in the nation — is stopped, it will force the Utes to go to the air, where Oregon is vulnerable. But at least then the Ducks could focus on just one aspect of the Utah offense.

Parris Warren said this week that the Utes have a better team than the Ducks, and that he wants to forget his time at Oregon. That's locker room material, and there's no doubt the Ducks will use it in an attempt to pump them up for the game. Warren has caught 24 passes in three games for Utah this season and averages a little more than 81 yards per game. The former Oregon wide receiver — he transferred after the Fiesta Bowl in 2001 — has a serious distaste for the Ducks and the team's old coordinators. That includes Jeff Tedford at California, whom the Utes defeated earlier this season. Warren will be hounded by Oregon's corners on Friday, especially since he has twice as many catches as any other player on the Utah roster. If he has a big day, it will be because of his physical ability to break from the line. He isn't the main Utah weapon on offense — running back Brandon Warfield is — but could become key to the game's end result.
