offenses are very similar, we know some of the things they are going to do."

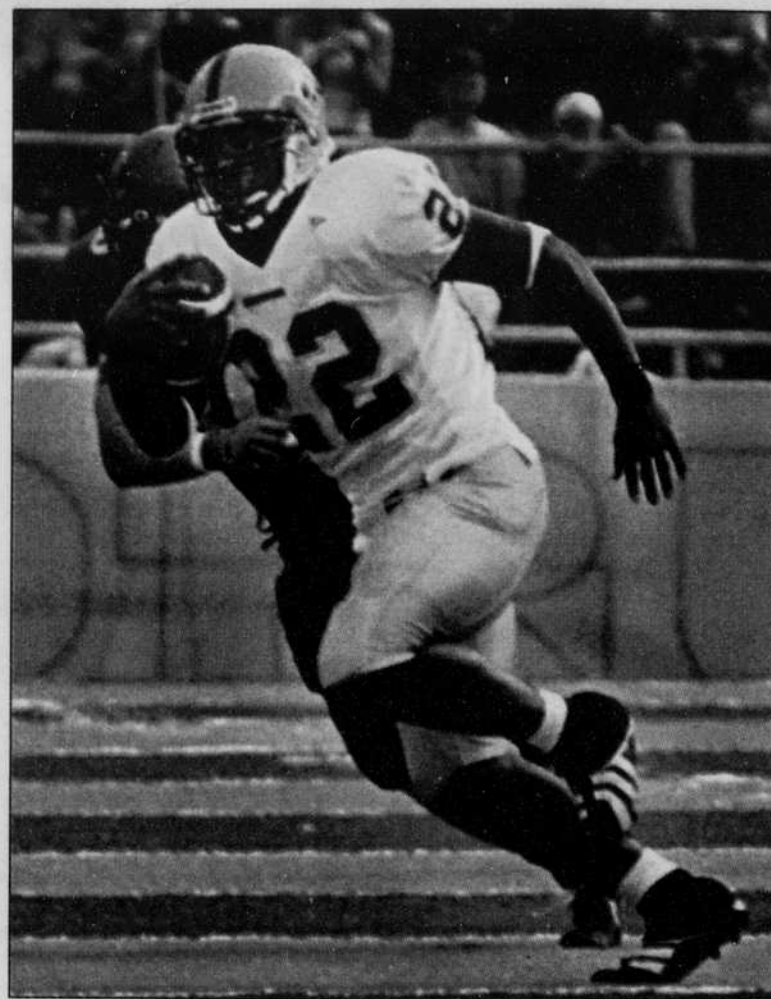

The Sun Devils are also solid on special teams. Senior punter Tim Parker is averaging 44.2 yards per punt, with a long of 66. Parker is one of 32 athletes on the preseason watch list for the Ray Guy award, which is presented annually to the nation's top punter. He was also picked as a third-team preseason All-American by Street & Smith's.

If the Sun Devils are going to stay competitive for the remainder of the season, they have to start playing better in the second half. The team has been outscored 71-31 in the second half, including a 27-7 second half meltdown against USC on Saturday.

Arizona State has been catching plenty of heat for their recent losing streak, but Koetter said the Sun Devils are far from finished. In each of the last seven meetings with Oregon, the winner has gone on to finish in the upper half of the conference race.

"Our players are getting plenty of negative feedback outside our building," Koetter said. "We're sitting here at 2-3 and we've lost to three top 25 team, and we've got seven games to go. We could still finish up this season with a great record and do a lot of things that are on our goal list."

game my junior year. It was good fun."

Now, Snyder's fun is about getting along with his teammates — particularly the offensive line — and enjoying playing in each game as a Duck.

"He brings kind of this young feeling," center Dan Weaver said. "Everything just kind of rolls off him. Nothing sticks to him. He's just very easy going."

There is one thing that sticks to Snyder. Six things actually; six tattoos on his arms.

"I drew one of them myself," he said. "I have my dad's initials on the front of my arm. (I have) my last name. I have the cross for Christ. Just stuff I liked."

When he speaks, a speck of silver also appears — a silver bar that goes through his tongue.

"He's very free-going, just a happy-go-lucky guy," Weaver said.

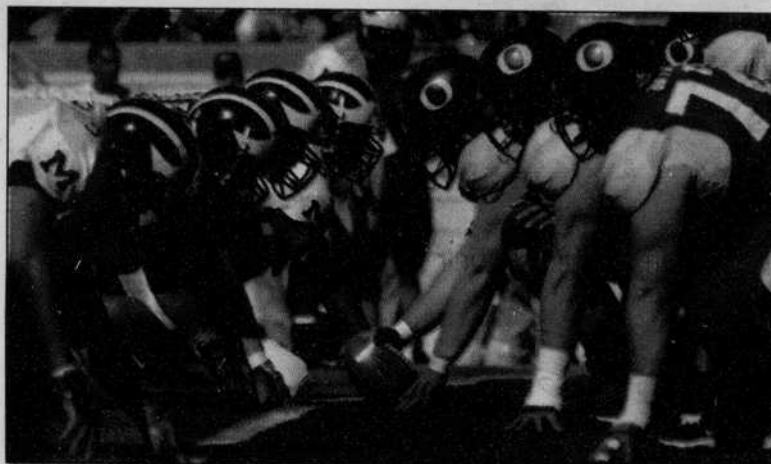

Snyder knows when to focus, though, and that's when he's on the field. While some guys are pumped up before the game, Snyder said he's pretty relaxed in comparison.

"When I'm in the locker room, I just get dressed, and I wait until I'm outside to use all my intensity," Snyder said. "I listen to music every once in a while, kind of get away from everybody else and just think about what I've got to do."

His passion for the game and intensity on the field earned him a start against Southern California in 2001 during his freshman season. He played in 11 games during Oregon's 11-1 season.

As a sophomore, he started 10 games and was the Ducks' top line-man against Washington.

This season, Snyder is the only

Adam Snyder (far right) has started all six games on the offensive line this season.

Ducks player to earn a Pac-10 weekly award, and he was also named Oregon's offensive player of the week for the same game.

He started the first two games of the season at right guard, then shifted to left tackle against Arizona.

Combining their efforts, Snyder and the his fellow offensive linemen have helped the Oregon offense to 857 rushing yards and 1,742 passing yards this season.

"We've got things we need to work on," Snyder said. "At the same time, we've got things we're doing well."

After Snyder works hard on the field with his teammates, the fun begins the moment practice is over.

"We call him Sean Connery," defensive end Devan Long said on Tuesday as he passed by Snyder.

"No they don't," Snyder said.

"Seriously," Long said. "We do call him Sean Connery. Write that down."

After Long walked away, Snyder laughed.

"Yeah, once in a while (I'm a jokester)," he said. "But when it's time to get down to business, I get down to business."

Eventually, that business will be work. Another reason Snyder loves football is that it prepares the players for the future.

"I like the discipline," Snyder said. "It's hard. It's going to help later in life. If you don't go on to play in the NFL, it's definitely going to help. You always have somewhere to be, you always have something to do."

The pre-journalism major — officially he wants to major in public relations — doesn't have specific career plans yet, but he has an idea of where he wants to be.

"I want to stick with athletics somehow," Snyder said. "I'm thinking maybe athletic director somewhere."

That will come when football finishes its fun with Snyder. After December, his senior season awaits, with doors possibly opening from there.
