Brad Simon (front) went to PLC on Wednesday evening to join Delta Upsilon. Some fraternities blame the new dry policy for a reduced number of recruits this year, but recruitment will continue through fall term.

RECRUITING

George disagreed. He said he didn't think the alcohol ban was drastically affecting fraternity recruitment. He added that freshmen who look for the stereotypical fraternity experience will not find a place in the University fraternity system.

"If that's their only focus I don't think they're going to find a fraternity focused solely on that," he said. "I like the fact we're taking the focus from the alcohol and back to the chapter."

Rinaker said his fraternity has always been dry, a policy which he said has kept out the members who only want to party. He said he felt the University's rules would lower the number of men interested in joining a fraternity, but that it would attract a better pool of members.

"I think initially it might hurt the greek system," he said. "In the long run I think it'll improve the quality of the guys."

This year, two past fraternities are also returning to campus, George said. Phi Kappa Psi is trying to "recolonize" the University after a four- or five-year absence. Phi Gamma Delta has also expressed an interest in restarting a fraternity here.

Both chapters retain their houses on campus but will need a large number of pledges to fill their leadership positions, he said.

Despite the return of two fraternities to campus, Birge said the greek community is still reeling from the effects of the alcohol ban.

"Overall, I think greek life is going downhill," he said. "I think dry is a major part of it ... It's kind of ridiculous when a 21-year-old can't drink in his own home."
