BUDGET

for a long time," Kahle said. "At some point it becomes more difficult to do the things you want to do without what you wanted to receive."

Kahle, a professor of marketing, said he was worried that with increased tuition, fewer students would be able to pay for an education. Additionally, there would be many students who would have to work harder to stay in school, he said.

"If you're putting in a lot of work at a part-time job, you're working that much less at what needs to be accomplished for your education," Kahle said.

Kahle said budget cuts also make it a challenge for administrators to balance the budget. He added that faculty members are also strongly affected.

"It makes it more difficult to attract and attain the best faculty and having the best faculty is one of the main things that makes a university," Kahle said. "I don't like to see that in jeopardy."

Vice President for Academic Affairs Lorraine Davis said she was very "disappointed and discouraged" with this year's budget.

"There is a disinvestment in higher education," Davis said. "It is short sighted not to look at the longer picture of the health of the state and general economic development."

Davis said state lawmakers weren't "understanding the importance of higher education."

"Higher education is critical in the growth of the state," Davis said.

Davis said the University, in order to meet reductions in the budget, will have to look at "all possibilities" while also trying to maintain the quality of the school.

Davis said she hopes that state lawmakers would be more supportive of higher education in the future.

"We would hope that they would be able to provide us with resources in keeping with the quality education that we are giving to people from this state, this nation and across the world," Davis said.
