Defensive end Devan Long has been a central piece in the success of the Ducks at stopping the run. The sophomore has 5.5 sacks, while garnering 8.5 tackles for losses. He has been the biggest surprise on the defense this season. It was expected that defensive tackles Igor Olshansky and Haloti Ngata would be the main focus of opponents when it came to blocking assignments, but when the latter went down with an injury against Mississippi State, all of that changed. Long has come on like gang-busters since the game against the Bulldogs. With defensive end Quinn Dorsey providing more support for the defensive line, some focus has been taken away from Long. However, that should play into his hands when the game rolls around to the fourth quarter. Against the Cardinal, Long could have a career day.

lining up across from an offense that has been disoriented of late. If redshirt freshman Trent Edwards starts at quarterback for Stanford, Long will have a chance to pressure him more easily. If senior Chris Lewis starts behind center, it could be a longer day for Long — but one that won't leave him out in the cold.

Oregon receivers have speed, which will be valuable against a tall Stanford secondary. Only one player on the team's two-deep list in the secondary, sophomore cornerback T.J. Rushing, is shorter than 6 feet tall. The Ducks need to attack the Stanford secondary to get back on track.
