Oregon cornerback Justin Phinisee is a good example of the Oregon secondary this season. The sophomore has tended to bend, not break when it comes to defending opposing offenses. At points during the season — games against Washington State and Arizona State — the group did break, but bounced back in wins against California, UCLA and Oregon State. Part of the secondary's slow start was getting used to a system implemented by new secondary coach John Neal that focuses less on man-to-man coverage. The Ducks are getting used to the new style of play — which resembles a zone coverage package — and it has begun to show. Against Minnesota the secondary may not matter too much, except if the Ducks' defensive line can stop the Golden Gophers running game. Minnesota features three strong running backs, which push the team to third nationally in rushing yards. If Oregon can stop that running game, then Phinisee and Co. will be vital against a passing game that can light up the scoreboard as well. It will take all parts of the Oregon defense to earn a victory over the 24th-ranked team in the nation.

MINNESOTA GOLDEN GOPHERS

While the Minnesota offense gets moving via the run, the Oregon offense focuses primarily on getting the ball moving through the air. Minnesota junior Mike Wojciechowski is a prime example of the Golden Gophers secondary that needs to play on top of its game to get the job done against the Ducks. Minnesota is 39th in the nation in pass defense, allowing roughly 209 yards per game through the air. The Minnesota defense has faced bigger receivers in the Big Ten Conference, but likely not as fast as the Ducks' Samie Parker, Demetrius Williams and Co. Kellen

Clemens has come into his own as quarterback of the Ducks and is reaching the level where he is reading defenses well on a consistent basis. If the Golden Gophers can stop the Oregon passing game, it will tilt the game in favor of Minnesota.

Oak Creek, Wis.
