Corrie Mizusawa has become an integral part of the Oregon offense in her first year here.

TRANSFER

in the WCC.

"We just felt that she was a strong leader, a great basketball player and a very, very good student," Smith said. "A good character for our program."

Throughout the preseason, Smith raved about Mizusawa's old-school point guard style. Mizusawa tied a school record with 14 assists in Oregon's Nov. 25 victory at Gonzaga, a little more than a week after Mizusawa missed the record by one in a victory against Valparaiso.

But that point guard part of Mizusawa almost passed up Oregon for Temple University in Pennsylvania.

"It came between Oregon and Temple," Mizusawa said. "Because their head coach is Dawn Staley. She's the best point guard to ever play women's basketball."

Oregon won out in part because it wasn't a long flight away, making it easier for Mizusawa's family to attend her games.

"My mom has every tape of high school and college," Mizusawa said. "She has over 120 tapes."

Her mother still attends every game that Mizusawa plays in, while her older brother Jarrod Mizusawa joins for the trips to Eugene.

Her brother and Carrie Mizusawa, her older sister, are a part of Corrie Mizusawa's basketball development.

Somewhat out of necessity, her love for basketball started at a young age. With siblings who played basketball, Mizusawa has had a ball in her hands since she was two but didn't start playing the game in a team-oriented setting until elementary school.

Things are a bit different on the college court than the elementary school one.

"She's our leader," teammate Chelsea Wagner said. "We don't really have to worry about Corrie, she does her jobs so well that we just need to worry about our jobs. We've looked to her a lot to help carry the team, and she's done a great job."

Wagner transferred from Hawaii after her freshman year. She and Mizusawa lived together last year, both spending the year as redshirts to meet transfer requirements.

While Wagner, a Springfield native, transferred partly to be closer

"We just felt that she was a strong leader, a great basketball player and a very, very good student."

Bev Smith
Oregon head coach

to home, Mizusawa's choice of Oregon wasn't solely for the basketball program.

"I love this school," Mizusawa said. "Even if I wasn't playing basketball here, this is a school I would want to go to for the environment and the drive to win in all sports."

Now her remaining college days are planned out: Play basketball at Oregon and graduate as an education major. But what follows that isn't so easy to predict.

"Obviously, if I have an opportunity to play basketball after Oregon, I'll definitely do that," Mizusawa said. "But eventually I'm going to go back to California, get a job, probably teaching. I'll probably coach at some point. I'm not quite sure."
