KERRY

states from South Carolina to Arizona to North Dakota.

In New Hampshire, skies were overcast and temperatures frigid, but snow that was forecast failed to materialize. Thus, the primary was expected to attract a record number of Democrats and independents, in part because of the absence of a Republican contest. Four years ago, nearly 152,000 voted in the Democratic primary in which Al Gore defeated Bill Bradley.

After a night at his Boston home, Kerry heads Wednesday for Missouri, which has emerged as the biggest electoral prize next Tuesday after the withdrawal of home-state Rep. Dick Gephardt.

His aides announced that he would campaign in the next six days in all seven states that hold primaries and caucuses next Tuesday and would start running television ads in all of them Wednesday.

Dean plans to recharge his batteries at home in Burlington, Vt., before heading for Greenville, S.C., for Thursday night's televised debate there. But a preliminary Dean schedule indicated that four of the nine stops he plans in the next week are in Michigan, Washington and Wisconsin, which vote after Feb. 3.

He has no stops scheduled in Oklahoma, Delaware or North Dakota.

Edwards is starting his next phase in South Carolina, where he was born and where he has said he must win to stay in the race. But in a bid to displace Dean as Kerry's main rival, he planned to head to Oklahoma for a stop in Tulsa and to Springfield, Mo.

Aides said his campaign was hiring staffers in Missouri, Oklahoma and New Mexico and had already aired television ads in Oklahoma and New Mexico.

Three other candidates also scheduled visits Wednesday to Oklahoma. Lieberman, after a stop in Delaware, was headed for McAlester and Oklahoma City. Rep. Dennis Kucinich of Ohio, once more in low single digits here, was also planning to visit Oklahoma.

And Clark, who flew to South Carolina on Tuesday night, will head for Tulsa and then go on to Arizona and New Mexico. He made an early departure from New Hampshire after polls showed an end to the brief spurt he enjoyed while most of the field was occupied in Iowa.
