to smoke."

Schmonsees had been a smoker for 10 years and had tried to quit four times previously, but he said he thinks he'll be able to stay a non-smoker now because of the free nicotine patches.

"The patch is wonderful," he said. "The only hard part is that you're still mentally hooked."

He said that it becomes difficult because the body doesn't want to smoke but the mind thinks it needs to.

Staight agreed and said that casual smoking at bars or with friends is still smoking.

"We try to remind students that you either smoke or you don't smoke," she said.

She added that habitual smoking can make it even more difficult to quit because people are used to smoking while they drive, during lunch or while out drinking with friends.

Students who want to quit smoking can visit the peer health educators at the health center to discuss ways and reasons to quit, Staight said.

Several of the peer educators work specifically with tobacco cessation and can provide students with the nicotine products.

Each prescription for the nicotine patch lasts for two weeks, while the gum lasts for about one week. Once a student runs out of nicotine products, he or she must make an appointment for another dose.

Since the health center has a limited amount of nicotine products available, there will be limits on how much students can receive.

Staight said that on average a student will be allowed five boxes of the nicotine patches, depending on the student's level of smoking.

Students who are heavy smokers start on level one, which has 21 milligrams of nicotine. Other students may start on level two with 14 milligrams, or level three with 7 milligrams. The nicotine gum comes in 2 or 4 milligram doses, with the choice of orange or mint flavor.

Staight believes that limiting the amount of gum and patches students can receive will mentally help them try harder to quit and prevent them from being addicted to the products.

"They need to be weaning themselves off," she said.
