aims to help men live healthier by expressing their emotions and recognizing needs.

"We don't have to be macho all the time," he said.

While the campus is about half male and half female, males comprise about 90 percent of student conduct code violations, yet only one-third of those who seek counseling are male.

Miller, who became the center's director last fall, said the Men's Center is continuing to grow and develop since it was first established as a student-run organization.

"We're building more liaisons within the University community," he said.

Davies said he was initially concerned that the center would be perceived as "anti-woman," but so far, it has established strong relationships with campus women as well as the ASUO Women's Center.
