JARVIS

Goldschmidt said in the release. He added that Jarvis wants the board to have the freedom to pursue a new direction that best serves "the Governor's revitalized mission and the board's initiatives for higher education."

Kulongoski started revamping the board late last year when he appointed seven new members including Goldschmidt, a former state governor. He also unveiled a new higher education initiative in November that includes objectives such as providing an opportunity for every Oregon citizen to attend a college or university, focusing on programs that create a demand for Oregon graduates, spending state funds on programs that drive economic growth and creating a strategy that allows for reinvestment in higher education.

During Jarvis' tenure, the system bore the brunt of substantial budget cuts that led to increased tuition rates that were "too often and too high," Jarvis said. However, he said administrators did their best to mitigate the effects of the financial predicament.

"It could have been worse," he said.

Jarvis said the disinvestment in education is one of the university system's biggest underlying challenges. He said it is essential for the state to find ways to reinvest in education and make a promise to provide education to all Oregonians.

"You've got to make a commitment and mean it and fund it," he said.

Melissa Unger, Oregon Student Association organizing director, said OSA really enjoyed working with Jarvis because of his willingness to hear student voices, even if there were differing opinions.

"He was really good about including students on the issues," she said.

Unger also said she hopes that Jarvis has set a precedent for the new board to allow for active student involvement. She added that Jarvis had the challenging task of being chancellor during harsh economic times.

"He got the system through probably one of the most difficult budget periods ever," she said.

Jarvis said he wants to stay in the West and find another job in higher education.

"I'm looking around for jobs," he said. "I'm like a senior."
